"Two mortars and twenty-four coehorns."—Smollett: Rod. Ransom, ch. xxxii.

coel-a-canth, a. [COELACANTH.]

Zool.: A term applied to certain ganoid fishes from their having hollow spines.

coel-a-can-thi-s, s. pl. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and ακανθος (akanthos) = a spine.] In Professor Owen's classification, the third family of his Lepidoganoidei, the second sub-order of Ganoid fishes. (Prof. Owen: Palaeontology, ed. 1860.)

coel-a-can-thi-dae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coelacanthus (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Palaeont.: In the classification of Dr. Traquair, a family of Crossopterygidae, characterised by having the pectorals obliquely lobate, the tall diphycceral, the dorsal fin two, the scales cycloidal, the air-bladder ossified. The species range from the Devonian to the Cretaceous period. [COELACANTHI, COELACANTHINI, COELACANTHUS.]

coel-a-can-thi-ni, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coelacanthus, and mas. pl. adj. suff. -ini.]

Palaeont.: In Prof. Huxley's classification of the Crossopterygidae, which, though retaining the termination -idae suggestive of a family, is raised to the position of a sub-order, Coelacanthini is arranged as the sixth and last family.

coel-a-can-thus, s. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and ακανθα (akantha) = a thorn, a prickle.]

Palaeont.: A genus of fossil fishes founded by Agassiz. It is the typical one of the family Coelacanthidae or Coelacanthini (q.v.). They occur in the Carboniferous formation and in the Magnesian Limestone (Trias) of the North of England.

*co-el-dér, s. [Pref. co = con, and elder (q.v.)] An elder of the same rank or authority; a fellow-elder.

"... He also is an elder, i.e. as others are. In the original it is συμπεριβήτορος, coelder."—Trapp. Popery truly stated, p. 1, § 5.

†coel-ēbs, s. [Lat.] A bachelor.

*co-el-léc-tion, s. [Pref. co = con, and election (q.v.)] An election at the same time; a joint election. (Speed.)

coel-él-min-tha, s. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, ελμινθ (helminthos), genit. ελμινθος (helminthos) = a tape-worm.]

Zool.: A name introduced by Prof. Owen for one of two leading groups or sub-classes of Entozoa, corresponding to the Vers intestinaux cavitaires of Cuvier. It includes the intestinal worms, which are hollow and contain an alimentary tube in the cavity of the body.

"... The first condition characterises the Vers intestinaux cavitaires of Cuvier; the second the Vers intestinaux parenchymateux of the same naturalist. I have rendered the Cuvierian definitions of the two classes or groups of the Entozoa by the names 'Coelmintha' and 'Stereomintha.'"—Owen: Compar. Anat. of Invertebrate Animals (ed. 1849), lect. IV.

coel-él-min-thic, a. [Mod. Lat. coelmintha (q.v.), and Eng., &c. suff. -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Coelmintha.

"... more of the Pentastomata of Rudolphi appertain to the Coelminthic class of Entozoa."—Owen: Invertebr. Anim., lect. v.

coel-én-tér-ā-ta, s. pl. [From Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and έντερα (entera) = intestines, pl. of έντερον (enteron) = an intestine.]

Zool.: The name given by Frey, Leuckart, and others, to a sub-kingdom of the animal kingdom, the species of which are distinguished from those of humbler organization by possessing a hollow digestive cavity with which the hollow interior of the body freely communicates. The prehensile organs are hollow tentacles disposed in a circle round the mouth. All, or nearly all, are moreover provided with organs of offence and defence, called thread-cells or Nematozoa (q.v.). Prof. Huxley places the Coelenterata between the Mollusca and the Protozoa. The sub-kingdom is divided into two classes, Actinozoa and Hydrozoa (q.v.). Examples, the Corals, the Sea Anemones, the Fresh-water Hydra, &c.

coel-én-tér-ate, a. & s. [COELENTERATA.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Coelenterata (q.v.).

B. As substantive:

Zool.: An animal belonging to the division Coelenterata (q.v.). One of the sub-kingdom including the Hydrozoa and Actinozoa.

"No Coelenterate possesses any circulatory organs, unless the cilia, which line the general cavity of the body can be regarded as such."—Huxley.

*coe-lés-ti-al, a. [CELESTIAL.]

coe-lés-tine, s. [Lat. caelestis = heavenly, sky-blue; caelum = heaven; so called from its colour.]

Min.: A compound of Strontian (q.v.).

Coe-lés-tine, s. & a. [Named after Pope Celestine V.]

Ch. Hist.: [CELESTINES.]

Celestine eremites, s. pl.

Ch. Hist.: A monastic order which arose in the 13th century, but was almost immediately oppressed.

Coe-lés-tin-i-ans, s. pl. [Eng., &c. Celestine (q.v.), and suff. -ians.]

Ch. Hist.: The same as CELESTINES (q.v.).

coel-i-ác, coel-i-ác, a. [Lat. coeliacus; Gr. κοιλιακός (koiliakos) = pertaining to the belly; κοιλία (koilia) = the belly, from κοίλος (koilos) = hollow.] Pertaining to the belly.

"The subcuticular and coeliac canals communicate with channels in the perivisceral tissue."—Huxley: Anat. Ins. Animals, ch. ix, p. 586.

coeliac artery, s. The Cælia axis, an artery issuing from the aorta just below the diaphragm.

coeliac axis, s. [COELIAC ARTERY.]

*coeliac passion, s.

Med.: An old term for diarrhoea.

coeliac plexus, s.

Anat.: A plexus surrounding the coeliac axis in a kind of membranous sheath, and subdividing with the artery into coronary, hepatic, and splenic plexuses. (Quain.)

coe-li-a-dél-phi-us, s. [Gr. κοιλία (koilia) = the abdomen, and αδελφός (adelphos) = alike.]

Pathol.: A malformed twin, having the bodies united at the abdomen.

coe-li-ál-gi-a, s. [Gr. κοιλία (koilia) = the abdomen, and άλγος (algos) = pain.]

Pathol.: Pain in the bowels.

coe-líc-él-ēs, s. pl. [Lat. caelum = heaven, and colo = to worship.]

Entom.: A genus of Beetles, family Curculionidae. Ten are British. (Sharp.)

coel-ó-dón, s. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and δόους (odous), δόοντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Palaeont.: A genus of fossil Sloths (Bradypodidae) from caves in Brazil.

coel-ó-dont, a. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow; δόους (odous), genit. δόντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Zool.: A term applied to those lizard-like reptiles which have hollow teeth. [PLEODONT.]

coel-óg-én-ya, s. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and γένος (genus) = a cheek.]

1. Zool.: A genus of Rodents, belonging to the division without clavicles. It is of the family Caviidae. The molar teeth increase in size from the first to the last, which is one-third larger than the preceding tooth. The zygomatic arches are exceedingly large, with the effect of rendering the face very broad. Coelogenys Paza is the Paza of South America. [PACA.]

2. Palaeont.: Two species of Coelogenys have been found in caves in Brazil, Coelogenys laticeps and C. major.

coel-óg-yn-ó, s. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and γυνή (gynē) = a female, here used for the stigma of the plant.]

Bot.: A genus of Orchids, the typical one of the family Coelogyne (q.v.). The known species are between 40 and 50 in number, and are very fine.

coel-ó-gyn-i-dae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coelogyne, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Bot.: A family of Orchids, sub-order Epideutreae, type Coelogyne.

coe-ló-ma-ta, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from caeloma.] [CELOMAE.]

Zool.: A series or grade of Metazoa, including all but the Spongiae and the Hydrozoa.

coe-ló-mate, a. & s. [CELOMATA.]

A. As adj.: Belonging to, or characteristic of the Celomata (q.v.).

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Celomata.

coel-óme, coe-ló-ma, s. [From Gr. κοιλωμα (koiloma) = a hollow.]

Biol.: The body cavity of any of the Metazoa; the perivisceral space.

coel-ó-náv-i-gá-tion, s. [Lat. caelum = heaven, and Eng. navigation (q.v.)] That branch of the science of navigation in which the position of a ship is ascertained by finding the zenith of a place from observations of the stars, &c. It is opposed to geo-navigation (q.v.).

coel-ó-spér-m, s. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and σπέρμα (sperma) = a seed.]

Bot.: A plant belonging to the section CoelospERMÆ (q.v.).

coel-ó-spér-ma, s. pl. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow, and σπέρμα (sperma) = a seed.]

Bot.: In some classifications, a section of the Umbelliferae in which the endosperm is hollowed out, the albumen being curved inwards from the base to the apex. The aspect presented by some seeds is that of a hemisphere channelled on one side. Example, Coriander.

coel-ó-spér-mous, a. [Gr. κοίλος (koilos) = hollow; σπέρμα (sperma) = a seed.]

Bot.: Having curved seeds or coelospERMÆ; hollow-seeded.

"The seeds being sometimes ... coelospERMÆ in the central flowers."—Darwin: Orig. of Species, ch. v.

coercion-act, s. A popular name for any Act giving exceptional powers to this Executive in Ireland.

co-ër-çion'-ist, a. & s. [Eng. coercion; -ist.]

A. As adj.: Employing or advocating coercion.

B. As subst.: A supporter of government by coercion, esp. in Ireland.

† co-ër-çœ'-i-tive, a. & s. [Formed as if from a Lat. cœrcitivus, from coerceo = to coerce, to restrain.]

A. As adj.: Constraining, coercing, coercive. "Coercitive power to laws."—Jeremy Taylor: Doctor Dubitantium. (Latham.)

B. As subst.: Coercion, constraint. "Of these, as man can take no cognisance, so he can make no coercitive."—Jeremy Taylor: Sermons, l.

coercitive force, s. [COERCIVE FORCE.]

co-ër-çive, a. & s. [Eng. coer(e); suffix.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having the power of coercing or constraining. "All things on the surface spread, are bound By their coercive vigour to the ground."—Blackmore.

2. Having authority to coerce or constrain by means of penal measures. "... less odious to a rude nation than the coercive justice by which they were afterwards restrained."—Hallam: Middle Ages, pt. II, ch. viii.

* B. As subst.: Power or means of coercion or constraint. "The judge . . . hath a coercive for all."—Jeremy Taylor: Sermons, II. (Latham.)

coercive force, s.

Magnet.: A force which offers a resistance to the separation of the north or boreal and the south or austral magnetic fluids, but which when once their separation has taken place, prevents their recombination. Hence soft iron can be magnetised instantaneously but the effect is not permanent, whereas steel is magnetised very slowly but when once the operation is complete its effects do not again pass away.

"To meet this question philosophers have been obliged to infer the existence of a special force which holds the fluids asunder. They call it coercive force."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science, 3rd ed., xiii, 890.

co-ër-çive'-ly, adv. [Eng. coercive; -ly.] In a coercive manner; by means of coercion or compulsion. (Burke.)

† co-ër-çive-nœss, s. [Eng. coercive; -ness.] The quality of being coercive or compulsory.

"There is another element . . . the element of coerciveness."—H. Spencer: Data of Ethics, ch. vii, § 4.

co-ër-çœ'-tant, co-ër-çœ'-tœd, a. [Pref. co = con, and erectant, erect (q.v.).]

Her.: An epithet applied to things set up side by side.

coe-rû'-lœ-an, a. [CERULEAN.]

"Cerulean Neptune, rose and led the way."—Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. xx, l. 17a.

coe-rû'-lœ-in, s. [Lat. cœruleus] = blue, and Eng. &c. suff. -in.]

Chem.: A blue colouring matter existing in certain volatile oils obtained from composite plants.

coe-rû'-lîg'-nœna, s. [Lat. cœruleus = blue; lignum = wood, and Eng. &c., suff. -œna.]

Chemistry:

Cediret, C<sub>18</sub>H<sub>16</sub>O<sub>8</sub> or C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>4</sub>(C<sub>6</sub>H<sub>4</sub>O)<sub>4</sub>. A violet powder obtained in the purification of crude wood-vinegar by means of potassium dichromate, and also by the action of oxidising agents on the fraction of beech-tar boiling at 270°. It dissolves in strong sulphuric acid, forming a beautiful blue solution. It dissolves in phenol, and is reprecipitated by alcohol in steel-blue needles crystals. Cœrulignone, by the action of tin and hydrochloric acid, is reduced to a colourless compound, hydrocœrulignone, C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>4</sub>(C<sub>6</sub>H<sub>4</sub>O)<sub>4</sub> which by oxidising agents is reconverted into Cœrulignone.

* co-ës-sœn'-tial (tial as shal), a. [Pref. co = con, and essential (q.v.).] Partaking of the same essence or nature.

"We bless and magnify that coessential Spirit eternally proceeding from both, which is the Holy Ghost."—Baker: Eccles. Polity.

* co-ës-sœn'-tial-i-tÿ (tial as shÿ-äl), s. [Pref. co = con, and essentiality (q.v.).] The quality of being coessential; a partaking of the same essence or nature.

"The appellation of the Soe of God . . . implies the same kind of relation to him, as that of a man to his father; that is, it implies coessentiality with God. . . ."—Ep. Burgees: Sermon on the Divinity of Christ, p. 41 (1794).

* co-ës-sœn'-tial-ly (tial as shal), adv. [Eng. coessential; -ly.] In a coessential manner; by way of partaking of the same essence or nature.

* co-ës-tâb'-lish-mœnt, a. [Pref. co = con, and establishment (q.v.).] A joint or combined establishment.

" . . . a coestablishment of the teachers of different sects of christiana."—Ep. of Landaf (Watson): Charge, 1791, p. 11.

* co-ës-tâte, s. [Pref. co = con, and estate (q.v.).] An estate or body of equal rank or position; a joint estate.

"A formidable prince who paid so little regard to the liberties of his coestates and the tranquillity of his empire."—Smollett: Hist. Eng., v. 97.

* co-ë-tâ'-nœ-an, a. & s. [Lat. coetaneus = of the same age; from co = con, and ætas = age.]

A. As adj.: Of the same age; coetaneous.

"For these began At once, and were all coetaneous."—Marmion: Cypri & Pascha. (Nares.)

B. As subst.: A person of the same age with another; a contemporary.

" . . . coetaneous of the late earle of Southampton."—Aubrey: Anecdotes of Sir W. Raleigh, II. 516.

* co-ë-tâ'-nœ-œus, a. [Lat. coetaneus: co = con, and ætas = age.] Of the same age with another; contemporary, contemporaneous.

"Through the body every member sustains another; and all are coetaneous, because none can subsist alone."—Beaumont: Sermons.

fâte, fât, färe, amidat, whât, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hër, thère; pine, pît, sire, sir, marine; gô, pôt, er, wôre, wôlf, wôrck, whô, sôn; müte, eüb, cüre, unite, cür, râle, füll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ë. ey = ä. qu = kw.

¶ Properly followed by with, but sometimes by to or unto.

* co-ē-tā-nē-ōūs-lý, adv. [Eng. coetaneous; -ly.] Contemporaneously; or of at the same time or age.

* co-ē-tēr-nal, a. [Pref. co = con, and eternal (q.v.).] Eternal equally with another or others.

"Hall, holy Light! offspring of heaven's firstborn! Or of the Eternal coeternal beam." Milton: P. L., bk. III.

† co-ē-tēr-nal-lý, adv. [Eng. coeternal; -ly.] In a state of coeternity. (Hooker.)

† co-ē-tér-ní-tý, s. [Pref. co = con, and eternity (q.v.).] The state or quality of being coeternal; equal eternity or eternal existence with another.

"For our belief in the Trinity, the co-eternity of the Son of God with his Father. . . ." Hooker: Eccles. Pol., bk. I., ch. XIV., § 2.

occur, s. [Fr. = a heart; Lat. cor.] Her.: The heart of a shield; also called the centre or fesse point.

* co-ē-val, a. & s. [Lat. coevalus, from co = con, and ævum; Gr. αιών (aiōn) = an age, a time.]

A. As adjective:
1. Of the same age.
2. Existing from the same time or period; equal in age or antiquity.

"Where mouldering abbey walls o'erhang the glade, And oak's coeval spread a mournful shade." Cowper: Hope, 322.

(1) Followed by with. "Silence, coeval with eternity!" Pope.

(2) Followed by to. " . . . we have no reason to conclude that idolatrous religion was coeval to mankind." Hale: Origin of Mankind.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between coeval and contemporary: "An age is a specifically long space of time; a time is indefinite; hence the application of the terms to things in the first case and to persons in the second: the dispersion of mankind and the confusion of languages were coeval with the building of the tower of Babel: addition was contemporary [contemporary] with Swift and Pope." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

B. As subst.: One of the same age; a contemporary.

"To have outdone all your coevals in wit." Pope.

* co-ē-voūs, a. [Lat. coevus.] [COEVAL.] Coeval.

"Supposing some other thing coevous to it." South: Sermons.

* co-ēx-ēc-ū-tōr, s. [Pref. co = con, and executor (q.v.).] One associated with another as executor under a will; a joint executor.

* co-ēx-ēc-ū-trix, s. [Pref. co = con, and executrix (q.v.).] One associated with another as executrix under a will; a joint executrix.

* co-ēx-ist, v. t. [Pref. co = con, and exist (q.v.).] To exist at the same time as another.

"The three stars that coexist in heavenly constellations. . . ." Hale: Origin of Mankind.

* co-ēx-is-tēnce, co-ēx-is-tēn-cý, s. [Pref. co = con, and existence (q.v.).] The state or quality of being coexistent, or existing at the same time with another.

"There was co-existence without contact." Ducklet: Hist. Civilization in England, vol. II., ch. vi.

1. Followed by with. "We can demonstrate the being of God's eternal ideas, and their coexistence with him." Grew: Cosmologia Sacra.

2. Followed by to. "The measuring of any duration by some motion, depends not on the real coexistence of that thing to that motion, or any other periods of revolution." Locke.

* co-ēx-is-tēnt, a. & s. [Pref. co = con, and existent (q.v.).]

A. As adj.: Existing at the same time with another; coexisting.

"The simplest extension therefore, as that of a line, must be regarded as a certain series of coexistent positions. . . ." H. Spencer: Psychology, p. 227.

¶ Followed by with; rarely by to.

† B. As subst.: That which coexists with another.

" . . . so every property of an object has an invariable coexistent, which he called its Form. . . ." Mill: Logic, bk. III., ch. XXII., § 4.

1. To buy. "I sought the fair, for honest employ." To coff what bunny trinkets I with see. Shirref: Poems, p. 40.

2. To procure or obtain in any way, not necessarily by purchase. "This ladie coff the Lulle Christoun of heritage, and gave in marriage to her some second some, callit John, and coff also the lands of Foulstruther. . . ." Blue Book of Seton, be Sir Richard Maitland of Ledington; V. Edin. Mag. and Rev. for Sept., 1610, pp. 227, 328, 330.

B. Intrans.: To barter, to exchange.

* coffe, s. [COFF.]

"My cokers and my coffe." Langland: P. Plowman, 3, 909.

* cof-fē-a, a. [Mod. Lat.] [COFFEE.]

Botany:
1. A genus of plants, order Cinchonaceae, tribe Coffee, family Psychotriidae. The corolla is tubular, with four or five spreading segments, the stamens coming from its throat, the berry anucleate, with two cells, each with a single seed. About forty or fifty species are known, the majority from the Western hemisphere. Coffea arabica is the coffee tree or shrub. It is an evergreen, with oval, shining, sharp-pointed leaves, and five-lobed white fragrant corolla with projecting stamens; the berry is first red and then purple. Though called arabica and abundant in Arabia, yet it is said to have been brought at first from Abyssinia. Now it is cultivated in the West Indies, Bermuda, and the hotter parts of America, as well as in many parts of the East. [COFFEE.]

2. (Pl. Coffea): A section of Cinchonaceae, containing those whose ovary has only one or two seeds in each cell, whereas the Cinchonae proper have a many-seeded ovary.

coff-feē, * cof-fē, s. & a. [Fr. & Sp. café; Ital. caffè. Corrupted from Arab. kahwa = coffee.]

A. As subst.: The ground roasted seeds of Coffea arabica. The seeds or beans are imported into this country chiefly from the East and West India, but the finest quality, Mocha coffee, comes from Arabia. In the raw state the beans are destitute of flavour, but on roasting, a peculiar brown oil, caffeine, is developed, and it is this body which gives to the coffee its characteristic aroma. The most valuable constituent of coffee is caffeine, C<sub>8</sub>H<sub>10</sub>N<sub>4</sub>O<sub>2</sub>, an alkaloid identical with the

1. Single flower. 2. Stamen. 3. Single fruit.

alkaloid theme found in tea. In the roasted bean it never exceeds 1 per cent. Taken in moderation, coffee is one of the most wholesome beverages known. It assists digestion, exhilarates the spirits, and counteracts the tendency to sleep. Coffee was not known to the Greeks and Romans but has been used from time immemorial in Abyssinia and Ethiopia. In Arabia it is known to have been used in the 15th century and throughout Asia in the 16th. It is a native of Abyssinia, Arabia, and parts of Africa. It was brought to the West Indies in 1720, and its cultivation has spread into Brazil and other parts of Central and South America. The annual production at present in various countries is: Africa, 36,000 tons; Brazil, 333,000 tons; Ceylon, 53,000 tons; Java, 90,000 tons; Manila, 35,000 tons; West Indies, 20,000 tons; with considerable quantities in some of the Central American States, Venezuela, &c. Chicory and other substances are often used as substitutes, or adulterations. None of these substitutes contains any substance analogous to the alkaloid caffeine found in coffee. In fact their only use appears to be to give the coffee infusion a greater depth of colour. The sale of a mixture of coffee and chicory, or any substitute for chicory, is perfectly legal, provided such mixture is properly labelled. It is only when a mixture is sold as pure coffee that any admixture becomes an adulteration. Any of these substitutes when mixed with coffee can be readily identified by means of the microscope, even when present in very small quantity. (W. Harkness, Esq., F.C.S.)

"In A.D. 1654 Locke wrote coff, showing that the word was not yet naturalized." Locke's Diary, given in his Life by Lord King, p. 42. (Trench.)

† Sweetish Coffee: The seeds of Astragalus baccatus, a papilionaceous plant.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to coffee.

"In the coffee husbandry the plants should be placed eight feet apart." Ure: Dict. of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

bōll, bōy; pōūt, jōwī; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bēnch; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, sious, -cleus = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

coffee-bean, s. The seed of the coffee-tree.

¶ Coffee-bean tree: Gymnocladus canadensis.

coffee-berry, s. The fruit of the coffee-tree.

coffee-biggin, s. A coffee-pot with a flannel bag or a wire strainer to contain the ground coffee through which the hot water is poured.

"I find none so good as . . . the coffee biggin with the perforated tin strainer."—Urs: Dict. of Art, Manufactures, and Mines.

coffee-bird, s. The name given in Jamaica to a kind of bullfinch, Pyrhula violacea, which builds its nest in coffee-trees, hence its name. (Ogilvie.)

coffee-bug, s. The name given to a insect, Lecania coffea. It is one of the Coccidae. It is injurious to coffee-trees.

coffee-cleaning, a. Cleaning or designed to clean coffee.

¶ Coffee-cleaning machine: A machine in which the coffee grains are beaten, rubbed, brushed, and winnowed, to remove the "parchment" or thin adhering envelope of the grain, and also purge it of dust and foreign matter. This is generally done by rotating beaters, rubbing surfaces, fans, &c.

* coffee-house, s. A house of entertainment where persons are supplied with coffee and other refreshments. Formerly the chief resort of every class for purposes of conversation and information.

" . . . wild rumours which flew without ceasing from Coffe-house to coffe-house and from alebitch to alebitch."—Mansel: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

¶ Constantinople is believed to have been the first European capital in which coffee-houses were instituted, the year of their establishment there being A.D. 1554. In 1650 the first one in England was opened in Oxford. They were suppressed by Charles II. in 1675, but were soon again allowed to be reopened.

coffee-huller, s. A machine to remove the husk or sac which covers the coffee grains. The machine is similar to a rice-huller. (Knight.)

coffee-man, s. One who keeps a coffee-house. (Addison.) coffee-planting, s. The cultivation of the coffee-plant.

coffee-polisher, s. A machine the object of which is to remove traces of mildew and stain from coffee on its arrival from the ship, or the effects of damp or heating when in store. (Knight.)

coffee-pot, s. A vessel in which coffee is infused. The chief kinds of it are (1) the Percolator (q.v.), (2) Coffee-pots in which there are arrangements for condensing the steam and the essential oil, the latter of which constitutes the aroma of the coffee, and returning them to the infusion. (Knight.)

coffee-pulper, s. A machine for treating the coffee fruit by removing the pulp and the envelope of the seeds.

coffee-roaster, s.

1. A metal cylinder in which the coffee-berries are roasted. The coffee-roaster is generally of a cylindrical or prismatic form, and is rotated on a horizontal axis by means of a crank. Two objects are attempted to be secured in coffee-roasters: to keep the berries moving and prevent their burning, and to keep the aroma confined as much as possible. The aroma depends on the essential oil in the berry, and the empyreumatic flavour is developed by heat; or the oil is developed in the berry in the process of decomposition. (Knight.)

2. One whose trade it is to prepare coffee by roasting.

coffee-room, s. The public room of an hotel, in which the guests dine and have their other meals.

* coffee-sage, s. A coffee-house orator. (Churchill.)

3. The box or chest in which corpses are enclosed before being committed to the ground.

¶ Coffins were in use in Egypt at a remote period of antiquity. The embalmed body of Joseph was laid in one (Gen. l. 26). This is the only mention made of coffins in the bible; what were in use among the Jews were biers (2 Sam. iii. 31, Luke vii. 14.) Some of the Egyptian coffins were wood. There were fine sarcophagi of stone, some of which all covered with hieroglyphics are conspicuous objects in the Egyptian room of the British Museum. There were coffins of laked clay in Mesopotamia. Cedar was used in Athens for enclosing the remains of heroes, and marble and stone among the Romans. But among the classical nations the later practice at least was to burn the dead and deposit the ashes in an urn. Burial has been nearly always the practice in the British Isles, and what may be generally called a coffin has existed from the remotest time, its early form being a stone chest, while its later one is too well known to require description.

"Such was the constitution of her mind that to the religion of her nursery she could not but adhere, without examination and without doubt, till she was laid in her coffin."—Mansel: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

* 4. A bier.

2. An instrument formerly used in boring for coal.

coiled, pa. par. or a. [COIL.]

coiled-spring, s. A metallic spring laid up in a spiral so as to have a resiliency in the line of its axis, either by extension or condensation, as the spring may be arranged. (Knight.)

coil-ér, s. [Eng. coil, v.; -er.] One who, or that which, coils.

coil-hench, s. [Eng. &c., coil = coal, and hench (q. v.)] A coalpit.

"They quill sets fire in coilhacks, upon privat revenge, and despit, commita tresson." Shene: Crimes, Tit. 2, c. 1, § 14.

coil-ing, pr. par. a, & s. [COIL, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive: 1. Ord. Lang.: The act of winding or gathering into a ring or series of rings. 2. Naut.: A sort of serpentine winding of a cable or other rope, that it may occupy a small space in the ship. Each of the windings of this sort is called a fave, and one range of faves upon the same line is called a tier. There are generally from five to seven faves in a tier, and three or four tiers in the whole length of the cable. The smaller ropes employed about the sails are coiled upon cleats at sea, to prevent their being entangled. (Smyth.)

coil-ón, *coylon, s. [O. Fr. coilon, couillon; Ital. coglione; Lat. colena.] A testicle. "I weld I had thy coylons in myr hond." Chaucer: C. T., 14, 867.

coil, *coigne, *coyn, *coyna, *coynye, s. & a. [O. Fr. coin = (1) a wedge; (2) a stamp on a coin; (3) a coin; Lat. cuneus = a wedge.] [COIN, QUOIN.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally: (1) A wedge. (2) A corner. [COIN, QUOIN.]

"And had him bald him all priy, Quhill that he saw thaim cummand all Ryght to coynge thar of the wall." Barbour, xviii. 804.

(3) A mint; a place at which money is stamped.

(4) A die used in stamping money, medals, &c.

(5) In the same sense as II. 1. "To fore the time er gold was smite In coigne that men the foreis knowe." Gower, II. 108.

¶ To pay one in his own coin: To return tit for tat; to treat a person as he has treated you.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds).

coin-assorter, s. A machine which separates different kinds of coins by size, or coins of the same kind by weight. (Knight.)

coin-counter, s. An arrangement by which the process of hand counting, piece by piece, is dispensed with. A shovel or tray has shallow depressions of a given length, width, and depth to hold so many coins of a given kind. The coins are shoveled into the tray, which is then skillfully agitated until the coins have snugly occupied all the spaces. The remainder are brushed off, and the complete quota is thrown into a scale to verify the count by weighing. (Knight.)

*coin-made, *coyno-made, a. Mercenary or simoniacal.

"Coyno-made Pastors let the sock decay." Davies: Muse's Tears, p. 13. (Davies.)

2. An invention, a new or original production.

3. A fabrication, a forgery. "This is the very coining of your brain." Shakspear: Hamlet, III. 4.

co-in-cide, v. t. [Fr. coincider; Low Lat. coincido; co = con; incido = to fall in, cado = to fall.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To fall upon or meet in the same point; to fall together or agree in position. "If the equator and ecliptick had coincided, it would have rendered the annual revolution of the earth useless." Chyeno.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To agree, to concur, to correspond or be identical with. "The rules of right judgement and of good ratiocination often coincide with each other." Watts: Logic.

(2) To happen at the same time.

II. Geom.: To fall upon the same spot;—thus, if one triangle be applied to or placed upon another triangle equal to it, the points of the one triangle are said to coincide with those of the other triangle and the sides with the sides. ¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between to coincide and to concur: "Coincide implies simply meeting at a point: concur running towards a point; the former seems to exclude the idea of design, the latter that of chance; two sides of different triangles coincide when they are applied to each other so as to fall on the same points; two powers concur when they both act so as to produce the same result." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

co-in-ci-dence, *co-in-ci-den-ty, s. [Fr. coincidence, from Low Lat. coincidens, pr. par. of coincido.]

I. Lit.: The act or state of coinciding or falling together, or in the same point or position.

II. Figuratively:

1. The act of agreeing, corresponding, or being identical in nature or character. "The very concurrence and coincidence of so many evidences..." Sir M. Hale.

¶ With with. "The coincidences of the planes of this rotation with one another..." Chyeno: Philosophical Principles of Natural Religion.

2. The state of happening at the same time as something else.

3. Anything which coincides, corresponds, or happens at the same time with another; a coinciding or corresponding combination of circumstances.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between a coincidence and a concurrence of circumstances: "A coincidence of circumstances is something so striking and singular that it can hardly be attributed to pure accident; a concurrence of circumstances, which seemed all to be formed to combine, is sometimes, notwithstanding, purely casual." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

co-in-ci-dent, a. & s. [Fr. coincident, from Low Lat. coincidens = falling together, pr. par. of coincido = to fall together.]

A. As adjective:

I. Lit.: Coinciding; meeting or falling together in the same point or position.

* cōinte-ly, adv. [QUAINTLY.]

† cō-in-tēn'se, a. [Pref. cō = con, and intense (q.v.).] Of equal intensity with something else.

"We can recognize changes as connotual; or the reverse; and connotual changes we can recognize as cōintense..."—Herbert Spencer: Principles of Psychology, p. 295.

"Thus far we have dealt with reasoning which has for its fundamental ideas, cōintension, cōintense, and cōintate; and which proceeds by establishing cōintension in degree, between relations conuate in kind..." The words Tense, Tension, Intense, Intension, are already in use. Intension being synonymous with Intensity, cōintension will be synonymous with cōintensity; and is here used instead of it to express the parallelism with cōintension. The propriety of the calling relations more or less intense, according to the contrast between their terms, will perhaps not be at first sight apparent. All quantitative relations, however, save those of equality, involving the idea of contrast—the relation of 2:1 being called greater than the relation of 3:1 because the contrast between 2 and 1 is greater than the contrast between 3 and 1—and contrast being habitually spoken of as strong or weak; as far as possible, the word Intension seems the most available one to express the degree of any relation as distinguished from its kind. And cōintension is consequently here chosen, to indicate the equality of relations in respect of the contrast between their terms."—Herbert Spencer: Principles of Psychology, p. 217.

† cō-in-tēn-sī-ty, s. [Pref. cō = con, and intensity (q.v.).] The same as COINTENSION (q.v.).

côl'-chî'-çéine, s. [Lat. colchicum], e connective, and Eng. & c. suff. -ine.]

Chem.:  $C_{17}H_{19}NO_5$ . An organic substance isomeric with colchicine, obtained by boiling colchicine with baryta water, or with dilute sulphuric acid. It is obtained in colourless plates, melting at 155°, by recrystallisation from alcohol. Colchicine is soluble in chloroform, alcohol and boiling water. Strong nitric acid gives a yellow colour with colchicine, which turns violet, then again yellow; if the violet solution is diluted with water and soda added, an orange-red colour is produced; ferric chloride gives a green colour. Concentrated sulphuric acid dissolves colchicine, forming an intense yellow solution; by the addition of a drop of nitric acid it turns violet.

côl'-chî'-çine, s. [Lat. colchicum], and Eng. suff. -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.:  $C_{17}H_{19}NO_5$ . An alkaloid which occurs in all parts of the plant Colchicum autumnale. Colchicine is an amorphous yellowish-white, bitter, very poisonous powder, which melts at 140° and is soluble in chloroform, water, and in alcohol; when dissolved in dilute acids or alkalies, the solutions turn yellow. Tannin appears to be the best antidote to this poison. It gives a white precipitate with mercuric chloride.

côl'-chî'-cüm, s. [Lat. colchicum; Gr. κολχικόν (kolchikon).] From the country anciently called Colchis, east of the Euxine (Black Sea), where it was said to grow abundantly.

thaceæ. The perianth is tubular, and very long, rising from a spathe, the limb campanulate, 6-partite, petaloid, the capsule 3-celled, with the cells united at the base. C. autumnale, the Meadow Saffron (not to be confused with Crocus sativus, the saffron of the dye), is found in meadows and pastures. The leaves and fruit attract little attention in spring when they are in perfection; both wither before the summer is far advanced. The flowers, on the contrary, which are pale-purple, flourish from August to October. To a superficial observer the plant looks a crocus, and in fact it has received the erroneous name of autumnal crocus; but it has six stamens, while the crocus genus has but three. The corms of the Meadow Saffron are poisonous, but much use has been made of them in medicine. [COLCHICUM CORM, COLCHICINE.]

2. Pharm.: For the pharmaceutical uses of the Meadow Saffron, see COLCHICUM CORM. Colchicum variegatum is found along the Mediterranean. Its corne constituted the "hermodactyls" of the Arabs used to soothe pains in the joints.

colchicum corn.

Pharm: Colchici cornus, the fresh corn of Colchicum autumnale, or Common Meadow Saffron, which is collected about the end of June, and stripped of its coat, sliced transversely, and dried at 150° F. The fresh corn is about the size of a chestnut flattened where it has an undeveloped bud. The dried slices are about a line thick, firm, flat, and amylaceous. The taste is bitter and acrid. Used to make extract, an acetie extract, and Vinum colchici. According to Garrod, Colchicum increases the flow of the bile, and diminishes the heart's action; it possesses the power of controlling the pain and inflammation in cases of gout. The seeds, Colchici semina, are used to form a tincture which has the same medicinal properties. They are hard, reddish brown, spherical seeds about the size of mustard-seeds.

col'-cō-thar, s. [Low Lat. colcothar vitrioli; a word of Arabic origin, and introduced by Paracelsus.]

Chem.: Red oxide of iron, ferric oxide, Fe2O3. A reddish-brown powder obtained when ferrous sulphate is distilled for Nordhanscu sulphuric acid; it remains in the retorta. It is used as a red pigment, and is employed to polish glass, and when finely divided by jewellers is known under the name of rouge. It is sometimes called Croccus Martia, and was called caput mortuum vitrioli by the alchemists.

Colcothar is the dry substance which remains after distillation, but commonly the caput mortuum of vitriol.—Quincy.

cold, * cold, * calde, * chald, * chealde, * coide, * coolde, * kalde, * kelde, a. & adv. [Old Northumbrian cold; A.S. ceald; Icel. kaldr; Sw. kall; Dan. kald; Dut. koud; Goth. kalds; Ger. kalt.] [See COOL and CHILL.]

A. As adjective:

I. Literally:

I. Of things:

(1) Deprived of or lacking warmth or heat; not warm or hot; chill.

"A cuppe of cold water."—Fyolfe: Matt. x. 42.

"... every body not absolutely cold emits rays of heat."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science, 3rd ed. viii. 1, p. 172.

(2) Causing the sensation of coldness; chilling.

"Must find a colder soil and bleaker air, And trust for safety to a stranger's care."—Couper: Tirocinium.

2. Of persons: Suffering from an absence of warmth or heat; having a sensation of coldness; chill, shivering.

"All out of work, and cold for action."—Shakesp.: Hen. V. 1. 2.

II. Figuratively:

I. Of things:

(1) Having cold qualities; not hot or acrid. "Cold plants have a quicker perception of the heat of the sun than the hot herbs."—Bacon: Nat. Hist. (2) Without warmth, ardour, or intensity; unaffected.

"... bot the jest grows cold."—Addison: On Italy. (3) Indifferent, unconcerned, reserved; not friendly or cordial.

"The King's cold look, the nobles' scorn."—Scott: The Lady of the Lake, v. 25. "... awaited the event with cold indifference."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xlii.

(4) Wanting in ardour, zeal, or spirit. "Charite of many sal was calde."—Hampole: Prikke of Conscience, 4040.

(5) Received or met with indifference or coolness; unwelcomed.

"My master's suit will be but cold."—Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 4.

(6) Unfortunate, unlucky, sad. "Cold news for me."—Shakesp.: 2 Hen. VI., 1. 1. "What cheer? as cold as can be."—Ibid.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 3.

(7) Chilling, dispiriting. "Care ful coide that to me saught."—E. Eng. Allit. Poems; Pearl, 50. "To thy cold comfort."—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 1.

(8) Hopeless, comfortless, dispirited. "Oft it hits where hope is coldest."—Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

(9) Cool, deliberate, not hasty or violent. "After this cold consideration sentence me."—Shakesp.: 1 Hen. IV., v. 2.

* (10) Unaffected; not inspiring, exciting or animated; spiritless, as a cold discourse.

(11) Applied to scent or the sense of smell:

(a) Not affecting the sense of smell strongly; not having a strong scent.

"At the hedge corner, in the colder tacit."—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew (Introduction).

(b) Unaffected by the scent.

"Small this business with a sense as cold As is a dead man's nose."—Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

2. Of persons:

(1) Indifferent, unaffected by warmth, ardour, or intensity of feeling; unconcerned; without passion or zeal.

"... a cold and unconcerned spectator."—Burnes: Preface to the Theory of the Earth.

"The cold in climate are cold in blood."—Byron: The Giaour.

(2) Reserved, without warm or friendly feelings; cool, not cordial or friendly.

"The commissioners grew more reserved and colder towards each other."—Lord Clarendon.

(3) Chaste; without sensual passion or heat.

* (4) Cool, deliberate; unexcited, not hasty.

"Your lordship is the most coldest that ever turned up ace."—Shakesp.: Cymbeline, ii. 3.

¶ In cold blood: Deliberately, without emotion, passion, or feeling.

* B. As adv.: Coldly.

"Cold and sickly he vented them."—Shakesp.: Ant. & Cleop., iii. 4.

cold-bed, s.

Metal.: A platform in a rolling-mill on which cold bars are stored.

cold-blast, s.

Metal.: Air forced into a smelting furnace at a natural temperature, in contradistinction to a heated blast, which is more economical, but produces an inferior quality of iron.

cold-blooded, a.

1. Ordinary Language:

Zool.: Having cold blood, applied to those animals the temperature of whose blood ranges from the freezing point to 90° Fahr., or very little above the temperature in which they live.

"In cold-blooded animals, however, it continues."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. 2, p. 64.

2. Fig.: Unfeeling, hard-hearted, cruel.

"... he had a rare skill in using honest enthusiasts as the instruments of his coldblooded malice."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

cold-chisel, s.

A chisel used for cutting metals, and driven by the blows of a hammer.

"Cutting out Bars of Iron into small pieces with a cold-chisel."—Dampier: Voyages, vol. I, p. 486.

cold-cream, s.

A cooling ointment or salve for the skin in the case of chaps, &c. It is prepared of four parts of olive-oil with one of white wax.

cold-drawn, a.

Expressed from seeds, without the application of any heat.

cold-finch, s.

(The first element is unexplained.) The Pied Flycatcher, Musciroca atricapilla.

cold-hearted, a.

Unfeeling, callous.

"... the coldhearted and scoffing Orammout..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

cold-heartedly, adv.

[Eng. cold-hearted; -ly.] In a cold-hearted, unfeeling manner; callously.

cold-heartedness, s.

The quality of being cold-hearted; callousness.

* cold-kind, a.

Uniting coldness and kindness. (Milton: Death of a Fair Infant.)

cold-pale, a.

Cold and pale. (Shakesp.)

* cold-roast, * cold-roste, s.

An expression used figuratively for anything very poor or insignificant.

"A beggerie little toune of cold roste in the mountains of Sauoye."—Udal: Apophtheg. of Erasmus, p. 297.

* cold-seeds, s. pl.

Old Pharm.: Seeds of various Cucurbitaceæ, as the cucumber, the pumpkin, &c.

* cold-served, a.

1. Lit.: Served up cold.

2. Fig.: Dull, tedious, tiresome. (Young.)

cold-short, a. & s.

A. As adjective:

Metal.: A term applied to iron which cannot be hammered in a cold state without breaking or cracking. The presence of a small quantity of phosphorus or silicon imparts this property to iron; also minute quantities of tin, antimony, or arsenic render iron cold-short.

"The ore which was used was quite cold-short."—Transac. Amer. Philosoph. Society (1873), vol. xiii, p. 14.

B. As substantive:

Founding: A void or seam in a casting occasioned by the too rapid congelation of the metal which failed to fill the mould perfectly.

cold-shoulder, s.

A rebuff. (Only used in the phrase, To give a person the cold shoulder.)

cold-shut, a.

A term meaning that a link is closed while cold without welding.

cold-storage, s.

Storage, in refrigerating chambers or any artificially cooled contrivance or building, of things damageable by heat.

cold-water, s. & a.

* Cold-water ordeal:

Old Law: An ordeal by which a common person, accused of a crime, might have his guilt or innocence established by the simple process of tying a rope round him beneath his arms and plunging him into deep water. If he sank he was deemed innocent and at once pulled up, but if he floated it was manifest that the water rejected him, which it was supposed it would not have done except he had been guilty.

Cold-water pump: A pump by which the condenser cistern is supplied with cold water.

cold-wave, s.

The progressive moving of an area of low temperature, generally caused in this country by an outpour of cold dry air from British America; hence also called (in the South) a norther.

cold without, s.

A slang expression for a glass of spirits mixed with cold water, and without sugar.

cold-white, a.

Of a cold-looking colour, like snow.

cold, * calde, * coide, * kelde, * cheide, s. [A.S. cald, ceald; O. H. Ger. kalt; Icel. kaldr.] [COLD, a.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Absence of heat or warmth; coldness, coolness.

"As might affect the earth with cold and heat."—Milton.

2. A sensation of absence of heat or warmth; coldness, chilliness.

¶ Cold is simply low temperature. It is produced by nocturnal and other radiation, by the passage of a body from the solid to the liquid state, by evaporation, by the expansion of gases, and by chemical decomposition.

II. Med.: The popular term used to signify a condition of body characterised by one or more of the following symptoms, viz., running or discharge from the eyes and nose with a sense of fulness and oppression of these parts; a feeling of rawness or soreness of the throat with possibly some expectoration of mucus or mucopurulent matter; some difficulty of breathing and tightness of the chest, if the cold has descended into the windpipe and bronchial tubes, some diarrhoea, if the stomach and alimentary canal are affected. Besides the foregoing symptoms, which rather indicate the locality of the malady, there are also wandering pains, more or less severe, about the body, especially the back, loins, and legs; the spirits are low and depressed; there is either incapacity or unwillingness to make any exertion, and above all a general feeling, which cannot be well defined, of being out of sorts, but which has received the name of malaise.

cöld, * colde, v. i. & t. [A.S. cealdian.] [COLD, a.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To become or grow cold.

"Hwenna thil strengthe woleth, and thil nose coldeh."—Old Eng. Miscell., p. 101.

2. Fig.: To grow cold, to sink in spirit.

B. Trans.: To make cool or cold (lit. & fig.)

old-dēn-ī-a, s. [Named by Linnæus after Cadwallader Colden, an English naturalist, who, in 1742, published a flora of New York.]

Bot. : A genus of plants, order Ebrutiaceæ. Coldenia procumbens is a trailing plant with villous leaves and white flowers, found in India, chiefly in rice fields after the rains. Its dried and powdered seeds, mixed with those of fenugreek, are used in that country to promote supuration.

old-hood, *cald-hed, *kald-hed, s. [Eng. cold, cold, &c., and hed = hood.] A state of being cold; coldness.

"Thou led us in kaldhed to be."—E. E. Pealser: P. L. v. 12.

old-ish, a. [Eng. cold; -ish.] Rather cold; inclined to be cold; cool. (Ash.)

*old-ish-ly, adv. [Eng. coldish; -ly.] In a coldish or rather cool manner; coolly.

old-ly, *calde-liche, adv. [Eng. cold; -ly.]

I. Lit. : Without heat; in a cold state. "Coldliche demnet in a beastis wribbe."—O. E. Homilies, p. 277.

II. Figuratively :

1. Without warmth of temper or expression; without concern; with indifference or unconcern.

"But most of the peers looked coldly on him . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

2. In a cold or spiritless manner; without warmth of feeling or expression.

" . . . who could not by any possibility proffer a coldly correct, cut-and-dried version . . ."—Daily Telegraph, Feb. 27, 1882.

old-nēss, s. [Eng. cold; -ness.]

I. Lit. : A state or quality of being cold; absence or want of heat.

" . . . there is no such thing as absolute coldness in our corner of nature."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), 2. 251.

II. Figuratively :

1. Indifference, want or absence of zeal or ardour; coolness of manner or disposition.

"I've heard of hearts unkind kind deeds With coldness still returning."—Wordsworth: Simon Lee, The Old Huntsman.

2. An absence or want of kindness.

"Let every tongue its various censures elute, Absolve with coldness, or with spite accuse."—Prior.

3. Purity, chastity.

"The silver stream her virgin coldness keeps."—Pope: Windsor Forest, 306.

4. Freedom from hotness, pungency, or acidity.

[Gr. κολεόπτερα (coleoptera), nom. pl. of κολεόπτερος (coleopteros) = sheath-winged; κολεός (kolos), κολεών (kolon) = a sheath, a scabbard, and πτερόν (pteron) = a feather, . . . a bird's wing, a wing, from πτερόν (ptesthai), aor. infin. of πτερομαι (ptemai) = to fly.]

I. Entom. : The name given by Aristotle, followed by all modern naturalists, to a great order of insects, characterised by the possession of "sheath wings." Of the four wings which the Coleoptera, like the other more highly organised insects, as a rule possess, the lower, i.e. the hinder pair, are membranous, and so large that when not in use they require to be folded both longitudinally and transversely. The anterior wings, which are horny or leathery in texture, are much smaller, and folding over the others, protect them as a sheath does the sword or other instrument which it contains; hence the name Coleoptera (Sheath, or Sheathed-wings). [See etym.] The head has mandibles which move horizontally for biting purposes. It possesses in addition all the accompaniments and appendages of a mandibulate mouth. [MANDIBOLATA.] The segments of the thorax are clearly separated, the prothorax bearing the first pair of legs, whilst the mesothorax and the metathorax (see these words) sustain the two other pairs, with the elytra and wings. The metamorphosis is complete, the larvæ consisting generally of grubs with six genuine legs, and sometimes anal prolegs, the latter suggestive of the similar limbs in an ordinary caterpillar. The Coleoptera are popularly known as beetles, but everything popularly called a beetle is not a coleopterous insect. [BLATTA, COCKROACH.]

The Beetle order is, in the recent period, the most numerous of any, it being believed that not less than 100,000 species exist; nor has it as yet been proved to have been otherwise in geologic time. The basis of most classifications of the Coleoptera is that of Latreille, who made his principle of division the apparent joints in the tarsi, the following being the sections, in ascending order :—

Section I. Trimeræ : Tarsi apparently with three joints.

Section II. Tetrameræ : Tarsi apparently with four joints.

Section III. Heteromeræ : The first two pairs of tarsi with five joints, the remaining pair with four.

Section IV. Pentameræ : All the tarsi with five joints.

Mr. Stephens divided them into six sections : (1) Adepgha, (2) Chilogmatomorpha, (3) Helminthomorpha, (4) Anoplurimorpha, (5) Heteromera, (6) Brachelytra.

Swainson arranged them in five tribes, viz., Lamellicornes, Predatores, Malacoedermes, Monilicornes, and Capricornes.

The Coleoptera pass into the Orthoptera by means of the Earwigs (Forficulide), which by some are placed within the latter order, whilst Kirby and others elevated them into an order of their own, Dermaptera (q.v.).

2. Palæont. : The oldest known coleopterous insects are from the Carboniferous formation. They have been called Curculioidea [CURCULIO], and Troxites [TROX], but whether the affinities thus suggested are correct is as yet doubtful. In the Lias and Oolite, beetles are more numerous. Many also have been found in the Tertiary, chiefly in the Miocene and Pliocene beds. (Nicholson.)

col-ē-ōp-ter-ist, s. [Eng. coleopter(a); -ist.] One skilled in the science which treats of coleoptera. (Hope.)

col-ē-ōp-ter-oūs, col-ē-ōp-ter-al, a. [Gr. κολεόπτερος (coleopteros) = sheath-winged.]

1. Having the wings enclosed in a sheath.

2. Of or belonging to the order of Coleoptera.

col-ē-ōp-ter-tile, col-ē-ōp-ter-til-lūm, s. [Gr. κολεός (kolos) = a sheath; πίλον (ptilon) = a feather.]

Bot. : The same as COLEOPHYLLUM (q.v.).

col-ē-ō-rhīz-g, s. [Gr. κολεός (kolos) = a sheath, and ρίζα (rhiza) = a root.]

Bot. : The name given by Mirbel to the sheath formed in some endogenous plants at the spot where the true radicle pierces the base of the embryo. In most cases the radicle, as it pierces the embryo, is covered with a cellular sheath, and gives rise to numerous fibrillæ similarly covered. Called also a root-sheath.

col-lē-pid-ā, s. [COLEPIDÆ.] Any Infusorian of the family Colepida (q.v.).

col-lēp-ī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coleps; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -īdā.]

Zool. : A family of ciliate Infusorians, of which Coleps is the type.

A. As substantive:

1. Med.: A disease of which the primary seat is apparently the colon, and which is characterised by severe but remittent pain of the bowels with obstinate constipation, but unattended by fever. The abdominal pain is allayed by pressure, showing that it is not inflammation of the normal kind, this being, as a rule, increased by pressure. Vomiting is generally present, as is also flatus. Sydenham called the disease belly-ache. It arises from various causes, especially from spasm, obstruction, over-distension, or inverted action. One notable variety of it is known as Devonshire colic, painters' colic, and plumbers' colic. It arises from the action of lead on the human body. In medical Latin it is termed Colica Pictonum, i. e. the colic of the Pictones, an old tribe existing in Roman times near Poitiers or Poictou, where a severe epidemic of the form of colic produced by lead once prevailed.

2. Anat.: Pertaining to the colon or large intestine.

* 6. A debtors' prison. (Slang.)
* II. Fig.: A number, assemblage, or swarm.
"Thick as the college of the bees in May."
Dryden: Flower & Leaf, 218.

B. Technically:

1. Old Roman Empire: Colleges in the sense A. I. 1 existed in Old Rome. A collegium was sometimes called also a corpus. [CORPORATE.]

2. Universities came into existence before colleges, and the original estate of things may still be seen in Scotland, where the immense mass of students reside where they like. The practice of living in common is only now beginning to creep in. Nevertheless, the word college has long been used in that country in connection with the Universities, though in a vague sense. In America also the words university and college are not well discriminated. In England, on the contrary, the two words are very precisely distinguished. It is thought that colleges first arose in connection with the University of Paris about A.D. 1140 or 1216, and that from France they spread to England. Mr. Mark Pattison was of opinion that the motive and design of college foundations in connection with the English Universities may be divided chronologically into three periods. In the first of these—the 13th century—the motive was purely academic. A college was an eleemosynary institute designed to collect indigent students into a house and provide them with two meals a day whilst they attended the university exercises. Of this type the original statutes of Balliol College, Oxford, offer a pure specimen. In the second period, of which New College, Oxford, may be taken as the most developed form, the early motive is still present, but the statutes now imply a rule of life. The colleges of this type are modelled on the best precedents of the monastic institutions, only that instead of making contemplation or evangelisation the motive for associating into a community, it is the cultivation of knowledge which is made the business of life. In the third period, that of the Renaissance, learning stands out as the supreme object of the founders. Of this type Corpus Christi, A.D. 1516, and Cardinal College, now Christ Church, A.D. 1525, are typical examples. (Mark Pattison: Acad. Organisation, 1868.)

Until lately all members of the two older English Universities were required to belong to a college; now there are a number of students unattached. The University College, King's College, &c., are affiliated to the London University, which, however, is an examining and not a teaching body; it therefore grants its degrees to anyone of merit enough to receive them, careless whether he obtained his knowledge at a college or not. Colleges for women have been recently built at several English and American Universities.

A college consists first of a head, sometimes called by that name, in other cases designated a Provost, a Master, a Rector, a Principal, or a Warden. Next in dignity follow Fellows of the college and Scholars of the college; generally these are students as well. The teaching afforded by the colleges at Oxford and Cambridge is provided by the Tutors, who appoint Lecturers with the sanction of the head of the College. The law of the college is that expressed in the will of the Founder, and some one generally possesses visitatorial powers to see that such regulations are carried out.

Prior to the Reformation the clergy regarded the colleges of Oxford, Cambridge, and other Universities as clerical corporations; the right of visitation was therefore claimed by the ordinary of the diocese. Blackstone, however, states that now they are legally viewed as civil corporations. In the United States College is often confused with University, the titles being applied somewhat indiscriminately. The Universities of Harvard and Yale, for instance, are commonly called Colleges, while many Colleges are entitled Universities.

¶ College de Propaganda:
Ecclesiol.: A name sometimes given to what is more fully and accurately termed Congregatio de Propaganda Fide, and popularly the Propaganda (q. v.). (Mosheim: Ch. Hist., Index.)

College of Arms: [HERALD'S COLLEGE.]

College of Cardinals. [See CARDINAL.]

College of Doctors' Laws: The same as Doctors' Commons.

College of Piety: [Translation of Lat. Collegia Pietatis.]

"He . . . busied himself with the cases of his fellow-collegiates."—North: Lives of Ld. Gwillford, 1. 123. (Davies.)

cōl-lē-mā, s. [Gr. κόλλα (kolla) = glue, the species being gelatinous. (q. v.)

Bot.: A genus of lichens, the typical one of the order Collemaceae (q. v.)

cōl-lēm-ā-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. collema, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: An order of lichens, proposed by Lindley, who considered that the lichenal alliance, generally held to contain only one order, should really be divided into three: Grsphidaceae, Collemaceae, and Parmeliaceae. [LICHENALES.] The character given of the Collemaceae is—Nucleus bearing asci, thallus homogeneous, gelatinous, or cartilaginous. They have, he says, the thallus of an alga and the fruit of a lichen.

* collemose, s. [COLMOSE.]

Entom. . A name proposed, in 1872, by Sir John Lubbock for one of two orders into which he divided the wingless insects, called by Latreille, Thysanura. For the other order the latter name was retained. They have a semi-masticatory or suctorial mouth, the first abdominal segment furnished with a ventral tube or suctorial organ, the last abdominal segment but one with an apparatus for leaping. They are popularly called Spring-tails. They constitute small leaping insects found in numbers when one shakes a bough over a pocket-handkerchief, or sweeps bushes with a hand-net. Sir John Lubbock divides the Collembola into the following six families: (1) Papiroidae, (2) Smynthuridae, (3) Degeeriidae, (4) Poduridae, (5) Lipuridae, (6) Anouridae, leaving under the restricted order Thysanura, the following three: (1) Japygidae, (2) Campodeidae, (3) Lepismidae. The Collembola are virtually identical with the old genus Podura and the Thysanura with Lepisma.

2. Palaeont. : Sir John Lubbock believes that the Collembola very nearly present the original form of insects, though he seems to agree with M. Brauer and Mr. Darwin that Campodea, which is ranked not under the Collembola but under the Thysanura, was the original stock whence all insects sprung, the reason being that various organs are generalized in it, which in the higher insects have become specialized, and the form of the little creature reappears again and again among the larvae of the higher insects. He has, therefore, devoted a whole volume, with fine plates, to a description of the order. (Sir John Lubbock: Monograph of the Collembola and Thysanura; Ray Society, London, 1873.)

col-lēn'-chū-ma, s. [Gr. κόλλα (kolla) = glue, and γκύμα (enphuma) = an infusion.] Bot. : The cellular substance in which pollen is generated. The name is first given by Link.

col-lēn'-chūm'-a-tōus, a. [Mod. Lat. collenchyma, f. collu, and Eng. suff. -ous.] Containing or pertaining to Collenchyma (q.v.).
"Collenchymatous cortical tissue."—Thomé; Botany, p. 54.

2. Fig.: To become opposed, antagonistic, or interfering; to clash with.

*cōl-lī-sive, a. [As if from a Lat. collisivus, from collisus, pa. par. of collido.] Cansing, or attended with, a collision; clashing. (Blackem.)

*cōl-lit-ŷ-gant, a. & s. [Pref. col = con = cum = with, together; Eng. litigant (q.v.).] A. As adj.: Disputing, wrangling, or litigating with another.

B. As subst.: One who disputes, wrangles, or is in litigation with another.

cōl-lō-cā-lŷ-a, s. [Gr. κόλλας (kollas) = glue, and kalta (kalta) = a wooden dwelling, a hut, ... a bird's nest.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds, family Hirundinidæ (Swallows). Collocata esculenta is the Edible or Esculent Swallow, or Edible-nest Swift, which receives both its Latin and its English specific name from the fact that its nest, which it constructs mainly of a glutinous secretion from the glands of its mouth, slightly intermixed with grass, hair, &c., is eatable, being regarded by the Chinese as excellent food. The bird is found not merely in China, but in the Eastern Archipelago, and on the continent of India, building gregariously in caves. There are several species.

*cōl-lō-cāte, a. [Lat. collocatus, pa. par. of collocō = to place together; col = con = cum = with, together; locō = to place; locus = a place.] Placed, situated, or stationed. "... the parts wherein that virtue is collocata."—Bacon.

*cōl-lō-cāte, v.t. [COLLOCATE, a.] To place, situate, or station. "To marshal and collocare in order his battalies."—Hale.

*cōl-lō-cā-tēd, pa. par. or a. [COLLOCATE, v.]

*cōl-lō-cā-tīng, pr. par., a., & s. [COLLOCATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb). C. As subst.: The act of placing, situating, or stationing; collocation.

cōl-lō-cā-tion, s. [Lat. collocatio, from collocatus, pa. par. of collocō.] [COLLOCATE, a.]

1. The act of placing, arranging, or disposing in any position; arrangement, disposition.

2. The state of being arranged or disposed in any position; arrangement, relative position or connection.

"In the collocation of the spirits in bodies, the collocation is equal or unequal..."—Bacon.

* col-lock, * col-leck, s. [col. kolla.] A pot or bowl without feet, s. large pail.

* A kneading tub, ij collocks, a wynocke, ij stamie, a charne, & beabe collocke. Inuent. de hiech. mondatire Wils [Barthes Soc.] p. 162.

* col-lô-cô-tion, s. [Lat. collocutio; from collocutus, pa. par. of colloquor = to speak together.] The act of speaking, conversing, or conferring together; conversation, conference.

* col-lôc'-y-tôr, s. [Lat. from colloquor.] One who joins or takes part in a conversation or conference.

"Licentia, one of the collocutors in that dialogue." -M. Casaubon: Of Credulity, &c., p. 142.

* col-lôc'-y-tôr-ÿ, a. [Eng. collocutor; -y.] Conversational; in manner of a dialogue.

"We proceed to give our imitation, which is of the Ameeban or collocutory kind." -Poetry of Anti-Jacobin, p. 10. [Davies.]

* col-lô'-dî-ô, pref. [COLLOIDION.]

† Colloidio-chloride Process:

Photog.: A photographic printing process invented by George H. Simpson, editor of the Photographic News, about 1863. It consists in holding in suspension a precipitate of chloride of silver in collodion, which is flowed upon glass or paper—in a manner similar to preparing a plate for the negative process—and dried in the dark. The sensitive surface so produced blackens on exposure to light, and will consequently give a picture under a photographic negative. An excess of free nitrate of silver is necessary to impart sensitiveness; an addition of citric acid and other organic substances is used to produce the desired tints. After exposure the picture is fixed and toned as usual. [Knight, &c.]

* col-lô'-dî-ôn, col-lô'-dî-ôm, s. [Gr. κολλώδης (kollôdês) = like glue, viscous; κόλλα (kolla) = glue; εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

Pharm.: Collodion is prepared by dissolving one ounce of pyroxylin in a mixture of thirty-six fluid ounces of ether and twelve fluid ounces of rectified spirit. The pyroxylin or gun-cotton used for making collodion is prepared by immersing one ounce of cotton wool in a mixture of five fluid ounces of sulphuric acid, and five fluid ounces of nitric acid, for three minutes, then carefully washing it with water, and drying it in a water bath; it must be kept in a well-corked bottle. It is used in photography; also in surgery to form a protecting surface to the skin. Collodion is a colourless very inflammable liquid, which dries quickly when exposed to the air, leaving a thin transparent film insoluble in water or in rectified spirit.

Phot.: A process in photography invented by Archer, who first published an account of it in the Chemist for March, 1851. An iodized collodion is made by impregnating a solution of gun-cotton in ether, with a small quantity of iodide of potassium or cadmium. A film of the iodized collodion is spread on the glass, which is then immersed in a solution of nitrate of silver. The image is taken in the camera, developed by a weak solution of pyrogallie acid and acetic acid, or a solution of protosulphate of iron. Excess of iodide of silver is removed by hyposulphite of soda or cyanide of potassium. This gives a negative. A positive is obtained by laying the negative on prepared paper and exposing them to light. [Knight, &c.]

* col-lô'-dî-ô-u-ize, v.t. [Eng. collodion; -ize.] Phot.: To prepare, as a plate, with collodion; to treat with collodion.

Phot.: A name applied to those processes in which a film of sensitized collodion is used on a plate to obtaining an image. In the wet collodion process the plate is exposed while moist; in the dry collodion process the plate is first dried. The collodion positives are melanotypes and ambrotypes; the images are formed on the collodion, so as to be viewed by reflected or transmitted light. When viewed by reflected light they are termed ambrotypes. Collodion negatives are obtained on a film of sensitized collodion on glass. [Knight.]

* col-lôg'-ue (ue silent), v.t. & t. [Prob. formed by a confusion of Lat. colloquor, and Eng. colleague.]

A. Trans.: To wheedle, to coax; to address coaxingly or flatteringly.

"They do apply themselves to the times, to lie, dissemble, collogue, . . ." -Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 237.

B. Intrans.: To converse or confer confidentially, especially with evil intentions; to plot, to scheme, to intrigue.

" . . . otherwise than equivoque or collogue with the pope . . ." -Milton: Prose Works, 282. [Latham.]

* col-lôg'-ning (u silent), pr. par., a., & s. [COLLOQUI.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Wheedling, coaxing, flattering, intriguing.

" . . . here is the collouging Jew's 'Domine, Domine, . . ." -Bishop Hall: Sermons; The Hypocrite.

C. As subst.: Flattery, deceit.

"Such base flattery, parasitical fawning and collouging, &c. it would ask an expert Venalitus to anatomize every member." -Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy [Preface.]

* col-lô'id, a. & s. [Gr. κόλλα (kolla) = glue; εἶδος (eidos) = appearance.]

A. As adj.: Resembling or partaking of the nature of glue or jelly.

1. Chem.: A term applied to non-crystalline bodies that are unable to pass through a wet membrane. [DIALYSIS.]

2. Geol.: A term applied to partly amorphous minerals. [Ogilvie.]

B. As substantive:

Chem. (pl.): The name given by Graham to jelly-like bodies which are characterised by a remarkable sluggishness and indisposition to diffusion, or to crystallization; when pure they are nearly tasteless. The chief organic colloids are cellulose, gum, starch, dextrin, tannin, gelatin, albumen, and caramel. The following inorganic colloids are important: hydrated silica, hydrated oxides of iron, alumina, chromium, &c. Some colloids are soluble in water, as gum; others, as hydrated silica and hydrated oxides of metals, can be obtained in solution by dialysis (q.v.). Some colloids combine with water, as gelatin and tragacanth, which may be called water of gelatinization. Colloids in solution easily pass from the liquid to the gelatinous state. Colloids readily permit the diffusion of crystalline salts through them, but are perfectly impervious to colloidal substances like themselves, hence such substances afford an easy method of separating crystalline substances from colloids, and by means of dialysis, crystalline poisons are readily separated from food, &c. [Miller: Chemical Physics, &c.]

colloid corpuscules. A name given to small cellular bodies existing in the brain normally, and also found in certain morbid products of the body. [Ogilvie.]

colloid exudation.

Anat.: The same as COLLOID MATTER (q.v.).

colloid matter.

Anat.: A transparent viscid yellowish structureless, or slightly granular, matter, resembling liquid gelatine. It occurs as a normal and a pathological product in the hypertrophied heart, in the brain and spinal cord, &c. [Griffith & Henfrey.]

* col-lô'id-âl, a. [Eng. colloid; -âl.] Of, pertaining to, or partaking of, the nature of colloid.

* col-lô'id-âl-i-tÿ, s. [Eng. colloid; -ity.] The quality of being colloidal, or of the nature of a colloid.

* col-lô-mi'-a, s. [Gr. κόλλα (kolla) = glue.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Polemoniaceæ. The species are pretty, and very easily cultivated.

* col-lôp, * col-lôppe, * col-op, s. [Prob. connected with Ger. Klops = a dish of meat made tender by beating. Cf. Sw. kalops; O. Sw. kollops = slices of beef stewed. Perhaps from Dut. kloppen = to knock; Ger. kloppen = to beat; klopf, kloppen = a beating; kloppen = to clap, to strike.]

I. Literally:

1. A small slice of meat; a carbonate. "Collope, Præparata, carbonatum, carbonella." -Prompt. Parv.

"Sweetbread and collops were with skewers prick'd About the sides." -Dryden: Fables.

2. A piece of flesh of any kind.

"The Lion is upon his death-bed; not an enemy that does not apply for a collop of him." -L'Estrange.

* II. Figuratively:

1. A piece, fragment, or portion.

"This, indeed . . . cut two good collops out of the crown land." -Fuller.

2. Used as a term of endearment, and applied to a child, as part of the parents' flesh and blood.

"Most dear'st, my collop."

Shakspeare: Winter's Tale, l. 2.

Collop-Monday, s. The Monday before Lent. In the North of England, fried slices of bacon were formerly eaten on this day.

* col-lôph'-ô-ra, s. [Gr. κόλλα (kolla) = glue, and φέρω (phérô) = to bear.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Apocynaceæ, tribe Willughbeieæ. Colophora uticaria, a South American species, yields caoutchouca.

* col-loque, v.t. [Lat. colloquor. Possibly only a mistake for colloquing (q.v.).] To converse, to chat.

"Colloquing in Pagan picture galleries with shorn-battled Philistines." -C. Kingsley: Alton Locke, ch. v.

*col-mose, *col-maus, s. [A.S. colmae.] The Coal-tit or Coal-mouse. The word appears to be also used for the Sea-mew. [COL-MOUSE.]

"In Lagenia is a pond there be seen colmoses birds." Causton : Descript. Eng., p. 54.

*cōl-ō-bi-ūm (Lat.), *col-obe (Eng.), s. [Gr. κολοβός (kolobos) = docked, stunted.]

Ecclesiastical :

1. The sleeveless dress of a monk.

2. An episcopal garment, like the tunic, but without sleeves.

3. A dress worn by a king at his coronation, and similar to the ecclesiastical dalmatic. (Ogilvie.)

COLOBIUM.

cōl-ō-bō-ma, s. [Gr.]

Med. : A maimed or mutilated organ.

cōl-ō-būs, s. [Gr. κολοβός (kolobos) = docked, stunted, curtailed; of animals, short-horned, short-eared, ... maimed, mutilated, from Gr. κόλα (kolos) = docked, stunted.]

Zool. : A genus of monkeys, family Semnopithecidae. The facial angle is from 40° to 45°, the muzzle short, the face naked, with cheek pouches, the hands are destitute of a thumb, and callosities are on the buttocks. The species inhabit the forests of Sierra Leone and other parts of Western Africa. Colobus polycomos is called by the negroes the king of the monkeys owing to the beauty of its colours, it having a jet-black body with a white tail, a brown face and a yellow and black hood or pelterine.

cōl-ō-cā-si-a, s. [Lat. colocasia, colocasium; Gr. κολοκασία (kolokasia), κολοκασιον (kolokastion) = the Egyptian bean, Nymphaea lotus and Nelumbium speciosum (two water-lilies), also the Colocasia of modern botanists (Colocasia antiquorum). See def.]

Bot. : A genus of plants, order Araceae. The spadix has a clavate or pointed top destitute of stamens, whilst on the closely allied genus Caladium, the summit of the spadix is covered with stamens, though the extreme apex ultimately becomes bare. The leaves of the Colocasia are peltate, the stem herbaceous, the juice milky, the rootstocks tuberous. India is the original seat of the genus, though species are now cultivated in most hot countries. The rootstocks of Colocasia himalensis form a chief portion of the food of some hill tribes. C. antiquorum, called by Linnaeus Arum Colocasia, the best known species, is cultivated in India, Egypt, &c., for its leaves, which though acrid are boiled till they are wholesome, and eaten as spinach. It has been introduced into British greenhouses. The stems and the tubers of C. indica are eaten in Brazil. The rootstocks of C. esculenta macrorhiza, called "tara" or "kophe" in the South Sea Islands, are used as food. The leaves of C. esculenta have a quivering motion at uncertain intervals every day. Lecoq, who first observed this, attributes it to the incessant pulsation of the imprisoned sap.

cōl-ō-cŷnth, s. [Lat. colocynth's; Gr. κολοκυνθίς (kolokynthis).]

Bot. : The name given to the bitter cucumber, Citrullus colocynthis, called also Cucumis colocynthis. It has unisexual flowers with five stamens, a 3-6 celled ovary, and a cucumber-like fruit with many seeds. It grows in India, Syria, including Palestine, &c.

"Himalayan colocynth : Citrullus (Cucumis) Pseudo-colocynthus.

"Colocynth is supposed to be the plant termed in the Old Testament (2 Kings, iv. 39) the wild vine (literally the vine of the field), whose fruit the sacred historian calls Pakkoth, a word which in our translation is rendered wild gourd. ... Colocynth was employed by the Greeks at a very early period. Hippocrates employed κολοκυνθίς ἄγρια (Cucurbita agriensis, or wild gourd) only in pessaries for bringing on menstruation. Dioscorides gives a good description of colocynth. ... By digesting the watery extract of colocynth in alcohol, and evaporating the tincture, we obtain a mass, ... to which the name of colocynth has been applied."—Pereira : Elements of Materia Medica and Therapeutics.

cól-ô-cýnth'-eín, s. [Eng. colocynth; -eín.] [COLOCYNTHIN.]

cól-ô-cýnth'-ín, s. [Eng. colocynth, and suff. -ín.]

Chem.: A bitter substance, said to be a glucoside,  $C_{26}H_{42}O_{10}$ , contained in colocynth. It crystallises in white bitter crystals, which are soluble in water, alcohol, and in ether. When boiled with dilute sulphuric acid it yields 77 per cent. of sugar, and a resinous mass which is called colocynthein.

Cól-lô-gne (j silent), s. & a. [Eng., &c. Cologne; Ger. Köln, a contraction of Lat. colonia, in its Roman name, Agrippina Colonia.]

A. As substantive:

1. Geog.: A fortified city of West Germany, having one of the finest cathedrals in Europe.
2. Ord. Lang.: The same as Cologne-water (q.v.).

B. As adj.: Found or made at Cologne, or in any other way pertaining to it.

Cologne-earth, s.

Painting: A native pigment similar to the Venetian brown in its uses and properties as a colour. (Weale.)

Cologne-water, s. [EAU-DE-COLOGNE.]

cól-ô-líte, s. [Gr. κόλον (kolon) = the colon, and λίθος (lithos) = a stone.]

Palaont.: A fossil worm-like body found in the lithographic slate of Solenhofen, and described by Count Münster as Lumbricaria, but considered by Agassiz to be the petrified intestines of fishes, or the contents of those intestines, retaining the form of the tortuous tube in which they were lodged. (Buckland: Geol. & Min., 1, 199, 200.)

Cól-lóm'-hí-an, a. & s.

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Colombia, a republic in South America (area, 504,773 square miles; population, about 3,878,000).

B. As subst.: An inhabitant or native of Colombia.

cól-ôm'-bíc, a. [Eng. colomb(o), and suff. -íc.] Derived from or existing in cubana.

colombic acid, calumbic acid, s.

Chem.: An acid which occurs in calumbo-root, Jaliscotheca Calumba,  $C_{27}H_{42}O_8$ . The alcoholic extract of the root is treated with lime-water, and the solution is decomposed by hydrochloric acid. Colombic acid is precipitated as white flakes, insoluble in water but soluble in alcohol; the alcoholic solution gives a white precipitate with plumbic acetate.

cól-ôm'-bín, s. [CALUMBINE.]

Chem.: A bitter substance contained in calumbo-root, obtained by treating the extract with ether. It crystallises in colourless prisms, which have a strong bitter taste, and dissolves in concentrated sulphuric acid, forming a yellow solution which afterwards becomes red; on adding water a rust-coloured precipitate is formed.

cól-lôn (1), s. [Gr. κόλον (kolon) = a member.]

1. Gram.: A point (:) used to make a pause greater than that of a comma or a semicolon, and less than that of a period. Its use is not very exactly fixed; being confounded by most with the semicolon. It was used, before punctuation was refined, to mark almost any sense less than a period. To apply it properly, we should place it, perhaps, only where the sense is continued without dependence of grammar or construction; as, I love him, I despise him: I have long ceased to trust, but shall never forbear to succour him.

2. Palaography (pl. cól-la): A clause or group of clauses written as a line, or taken as a standard of measure in ancient MSS. or texts. (N.E.D.)

cól-lôn (2), s. [Gr. κόλον (kolon) = food, the colon.]

1. Anat.: The greatest and widest of all the intestines, about eight or nine hands' breadth long. It begins where the ilium ends, in the cavity of the os ilium on the right side; from thence ascending by the kidney on the same side, it passes under the concave side of the liver, to which it is sometimes tied, as likewise to the gall-bladder, which tinges it yellow in that place; then it runs under the bottom of the stomach to the spleen in the left side, to which it is also knit; from thence it turns down to the left kidney; and thence passing, in form of an S, it terminates at the upper part of the os sacrum in the rectum. (Quincy.)

"The contents of the colon are of a sour, fetid, acid smell in rabbits."—Floyer: On the Humours.

2. Entom.: The second portion of the intestines. It is generally wider than the first part. (Huzley: Anat. Invert., p. 409.)

* cól-ô-ne, s. [Lat. colonus.] A clown, a rustic. [CLOWN.]

"A country colone toll and moll." Burton: Anat. Melanch. Dem. to the Reader.

coloneloy (pron. kūr'-nel-oy), s. [Eng. colonel; -oy.] The rank, office, or commission of a colonel.

"... Sir Arthur obtained ... the coloneloy of the 3rd regiment of the line."—Gleig: Translation of Brialmont's Life of Wellington, p. 167.

* cól-ô-nél'-lîng, pr. par. or s. [COLONEL, v.]

colonelship (pron. kūr'-nel-shîp), s. [Eng. colonel; -ship.]

1. The same as COLONELCY (q.v.).

* 2. The feelings or manners of a colonel.

"While he continued a subaltern, he complained against the pride of colonels towards their officers; yet in a few minutes after he had received his commission for a regiment, he confessed that colonelship was coming fast upon him."—Swift.

* cól-ôn-ér, s. [Lat. colonus.] A colonist, a countryman or farmer.

"[A certain tract of land] they made over to coloners and new inhabitants."—Holland: Camden, p. 138. (Darvis.)

cól-ô-ní-al, a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. colonia = a colony.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a colony.

B. As substantive:

1. An inhabitant of a colony.

2. (Contemptuously): A colonial bishop, specially one who has resigned his see abroad and returned permanently to England.

colonial bishoprics. There are fifty-one colonial bishoprics, the first established being that of Nova Scotia in 1787. Colonial bishops can exercise all episcopal functions in Great Britain except jurisdiction.

colonial office. The office where business connected with the government of the Colonies is carried on. A Secretary of State for the Colonies was first appointed in 1768. In 1782 the title was abolished again and the Colonies placed under the Home Secretary, and in 1801 the Secretary for War. In 1854 the original arrangement was reverted to, and there have been Colonial Secretaries ever since.

† cól-ô-ní-al-îsm, s. [Eng. colonial; -ism.] An idiom, phrase, or habit peculiar to or characteristic of colonials.

cól-ô-ní-al-îy, adv. [Eng. colonial; -ly.] By colonials, in the colonies, or in one of them.

"Lasagna, as fortified posts are colonially called."—Times, April 8, 1879; Petermaritzburg Correspondent.

cól-ôn'-yo-al, a. [Formed as if from a Lat. colonicus, from colonus.] Of or pertaining to farming or husbandry.

"Colonial services were those, which were done by the corals and soemen . . . to their lords."—Spelman.

cól-ôn-îst, s. [Eng. colonist; -ist.]

1. One who is a member of a colonizing expedition; a colonizer.

"The colonists carry out with them a knowledge of agriculture and of other useful arts."—A. Smith: Wealth of Nations, iv. 7.

2. A member or inhabitant of a colony; a settler in a colony.

cól-ôn-î-tîs, cól-î-tîs, s. [Eng. colon (2) (q.v.), and Gr. suff. -itis (itis) = denoting inflammation.]

Med.: Inflammation of the colon, called by French writers, colitis. Dysentery (q.v.).

cól-ôn-îz'-a-ble, a. [Eng. colonize; -able.] That may be colonized.

cól-ôn-î-zā-tion, cól-ôn-î-gā-tion, s. [Eng. coloniz(e); -ation.] The act of colonizing, or founding colonies; the state of being colonized.

"... our growth by colonization, and by conquest."—Burke: On the Cause of Discontent.

† cól-ôn-î-zā-tion-îst, s. [Eng. coloniz(e); -ist.] A supporter of colonization; especially, in America, a favourer of the colonization of Africa by emigrants from the coloured population of the United States. (Webster.)

cól-ôn-îze, cól-ôn-îze, v. t. & i. [Fr. coloniser, from colonia.]

A. Transitive:

1. To found or plant a colony in; to settle in; to people with colonists.

"Druna hath advantage by acquies of islands, which the colonizeth and forthwith daily."—Howell: Wood Forest.

2. To migrate to and settle in.

B. Intrans.: To found or plant colonies.

cól-ôn-îzed, cól-ôn-îsed, pa. par. or a. [COLONIZE.]

cól-ôn-î-zér, cól-ôn-î-zér, s. [Eng. coloniz(e); -er.] One who colonizes or settles in a colony. (Chambers.)

peristyle; and when double or more, polystyle. (See these words.) The colonnade is, more over, designated according to the nature of the intercolumniations introduced, as follows—pseudostyle, when the space between the columns is one diameter and a half of the column; systyle, when it is of two diameters; eustyle, when of two diameters and a quarter; diastyle, when three; and arcostyle, when four. (Gwilt.)

† A colonnade differs from an arcade in this respect, that the columns of the former support straight architraves instead of arches. (Gloss. Arch.)

col-ôn-nâd'-éd, a. [Eng. colonnad(e); -ed.] Furnished with a colonnade.

col-lônne, s. [Fr. = a column.] One of the three rows of twelve figures each marked on a roulette-table.

col-ôn-nette, s. [Fr.] A little column. "The façade . . . with its multiple colonnettes and pilasters."—C. C. Perkins: Italian Sculpture, p. 187.

col-ôn-ÿ, s. [Fr. colonie; Ital. & Lat. colonia, from Lat. colonus, from colo = to till, to cultivate.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. A body or number of persons sent out from the mother-country to colonize and settle in some distant land, and remaining subject to the jurisdiction of the parent state.

"Ostris, or the Bœchus of the ancients, is reported to have civilized the Indians, planting colonies, and building cities."—Arbuthnot: On Coins.

2. The district or part of a country colonized.

"In fact, however, the Revolution found Ireland emancipated from the dominion of the English colony."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

II. Fig.: A number or body of living creatures or plants living or growing together.

B. Technically:

I. History:

1. Phœnician Colonies: Ere yet the Latin word existed, or at least had acquired the meaning of colony, nations whose territory was too small for their population, sent forth some of their numbers to occupy other regions. The great maritime nation of antiquity, the Phœnicians, were also early colonisers. Tyre was called by Isaiah "the daughter of Zidon," ch. xxiii, 12, by which is meant that Tyre was originally a Sidonian colony. Tyre in turn founded various settlements, such as Carthage, Gades (Cadiz), and others.

2. Grecian Colonies: Almost every Greek state and tribe sent forth colonies; the whole west of Asia Minor and the adjacent islands were studied with them, as was Southern Italy; besides these, the Corinthians founded Syracuse in Sicily, and the Phœceans Marselle in Southern France. It is, however, worthy of remark that kolonia (kolônia), in Greek, primarily meant a grave, and not a colony, and when, in the Acts of the Apostles (xvii, 12), it is used in the latter sense, it is only as a Greek method of writing the Roman word.

3. Roman Colonies: The Phœnician and Greek colonies were small states independent of the mother country; the Roman colonies, however, were subject to the parent government. They were of two kinds—citizen or civil colonies, with a plough upon their coins, and military colonies, with warlike ensigns on theirs.

4. Modern European Colonies: In founding colonies, as in so much more, Italy led the way, Pisa, Genoa, and Venice having done so in mediæval times. Spain and Portugal followed next, the former in America, the Philippine Islands, &c., the latter chiefly in the East Indies and in Brazil. Holland succeeded Portugal in the East Indies, and occupied the Cape of Good Hope, taken from it during the Napoleonic war. France has been unfortunate in its colonies, many of which are now under the sway of the English ruler. The British colonial empire is the most magnificent the world has ever seen or will see. New England settled by the Puritans, Pennsylvania by the Quakers, and Virginia by the Cavaliers, became the nucleus of the great colony which, becoming independent in 1776, has developed into the United States, now more populous by some 30 millions than the mother country, and occupying an area of about 3,556,650 square miles. The Dominion of Canada, aggregated around the territory surrendered by the French in 1763, has an area of about 3,620,510 square miles, while the whole British possessions in America have about 4,350,000. The area of Europe, on the other hand, is about 3,768,000 square miles. Australia, all of which is claimed by Great Britain, is believed to have about 2,967,500 square miles. Adding New Zealand and other settlements in the Pacific, this is brought up to about 3,181,344. The area of the Cape Colony and the adjacent more or less settled territories is at least 240,110 square miles; the English African possessions about 270,000. Guiana in South America has an area of about 100,000 square miles. The United States have no colonies, and have avoided a colonial policy.

II. Law: Colonies were obtained (1) by conquest, (2) by cession under treaty, (3) by occupancy, (4) or by hereditary descent. In the first two cases the colony retains its own laws till they are altered by the Sovereign or Council, subordinate however to Parliament. In the third case the colony, which is of the type called a plantation, is under such English laws as are applicable to a community of this type. In the fourth case, the laws previously existing are in force till modified by Parliament. The larger colonies are now very nearly independent. The Home authorities appoint their governors, but they have legislatures of their own, which sometimes exert their power in taxing manufactured goods imported from the mother country, and they are encouraged to raise troops and trust to them for defence in ordinary emergencies.

III. Botany: A group of fungi or algae (generally unicellular), produced by division from a parent cell, and forming groups or chains.

IV. Zool.: An aggregate of individuals, such as a polypidom; used generally of the Actinozoa, Hydrozoa, and Polyzoa, but frequently employed of the social or compound Ascidiæ, of which Botryllus and Clavellina are examples. [TUNICATA.]

V. Geol.: A phenomenon to which attention was called by M. Barrande, the eminent Bohemian palæontologist, and which has been defined as the co-existence of two general faunas, which considered in their entirety are nevertheless distinct. The Lower and Upper Silurian rocks have different assemblages of fossils. In examining Lower Silurian strata Barrande found that certain Upper Silurian fossils made their appearance in particular beds, then vanished, then reappeared again some beds higher in the series, but which still were Lower Silurian. It is a canon of geology that no species which once becomes everywhere extinct is ever again reintroduced. Barrande is therefore of opinion that an Upper Silurian sea, with groups of characteristic fossils, existed in one part of Europe while a Lower Silurian one had not departed from Bohemia. The barrier between the two was occasionally broken down to a partial extent, allowing the escape of a few species from the one to the other. Further investigation has shown that Barrande's instances are fallacious, and due to inversions of strata.

* col-ôn-ÿ, v. t. [COLONY, s.] To colonize.

col'-ô-phâne, s. [Fr. colophane.] [COLOPHONIA.]

Chem.: C<sub>20</sub>H<sub>30</sub>O<sub>2</sub>. A yellow amorphous resin, soluble in alcohol, which occurs in icca-resin, obtained from trees belonging to the order Terebinthaceæ growing in Guiana.

col'-ô-ph-an-ÿ, s. [COLOPHONY.]

col'-ô-phène, s. [Eng., &c. colophony], and suff. -ene (Chem.)]

Chem.: C<sub>20</sub>H<sub>32</sub> = diterebene. An aromatic hydrocarbon, formed by the action of strong sulphuric acid on turpentine oil. It boils at 310°.

col'-ô-phîl-ène, s. [Eng., &c. colophony]; suff. -ene (Chem.)]

Chem.: C<sub>20</sub>H<sub>32</sub>. A hydrocarbon obtained by saturating colophene with hydrochloric acid gas, and distilling the indigo-coloured product with harts.

col'-ô-phôl'-ic, a. [Eng., &c. colophony]; alcohol (ol), and suff. -ic.] Pertaining to, or derived from, colophony.

colopholic acid, s.

Chem.: The constituent of colophony least soluble in alcohol.

col'-ô-phôn, s. [Gr. καλοφών (kalophôn) = the top, the summit.]

Bibliog.: A device or inscription giving the printer's name, place of printing, and date, formerly commonly printed at the end of books.

"But the same practice continued when the colophon, or final description, fell into disuse. . . ."—De Morgan: On the Difficulty of Correct Description of Books.

* col'-ô-phô-nî-a, s. [In Fr. colophonie, colophane; Prov. colophonía; Sp. & Ital. colofonia, from Gr. καλοφώνη (kalophônê) = resin, from the town of Colophon in Asia Minor.]

1. The gum derived from the genus of plants described under 2.

2. An obsolete name for the genus now called Canarium (q.v.). Colophonía mauritiana, the plant which furnished the resin, is now called Canarium commune.

* col'-ô-phôn'-ÿ-an, a. [Eng. colophon; -ian.] Bibliog.: Pertaining to the colophon of a book. (Cudworth.)

col'-ô-phôn'-ÿc, a. [Eng. colophon(y) (q.v.), and suff. -ic.] Pertaining to, existing in, or derived from colophony.

colophonic acid, s.

Chem.: A name given to the resinous acids pinic, pimanic, sylic, and colophonic, which are present in colophony. Some chemists state that the acid is chiefly abietic acid.

col'-ô-ph'-ôn-in, s. [Eng. colophon(y), and suff. -in.]

Chem.: C<sub>11</sub>H<sub>22</sub>O. By washing old essence of resin with water, and evaporating the wash water, colophonin hydrate is obtained, C<sub>11</sub>H<sub>22</sub>O<sub>2</sub>.H<sub>2</sub>O, in large colourless crystals, soluble in water, alcohol, and ether. It gives a green colour with acids.

col'-ô-ph'-ôn-ite, s. [From Eng. colophony = a resin; Gr. καλοφώνιος (kalophônios) = from Colophon in Ionia.]

Min.: A variety of coarse granular brownish yellow or reddish brown garnet, resinous in lustre, like colophony, and usually with iridescent lines. It is found at Arendal in Norway. (Dana & Phillips.)

col'-ô-phôn'-ène, s. [Eng. colophon(y), and suff. -ene.]

Chem.: C<sub>11</sub>H<sub>18</sub>O. An oil obtained by the dry distillation of colophony. It is a colourless refractive liquid, boiling at 87°.

col'-ô-ph'-ôn-ÿ, s. [COLOPHONIA.]

Chem.: The resinous substance which remains when turpentine or pure resin is heated till the water and volatile oil is expelled. It is a mixture of several resinous isomeric acids, C<sub>21</sub>H<sub>38</sub>O<sub>2</sub>. They are probably formed from the oxidation of turpentine oil, thus 2C<sub>10</sub>H<sub>16</sub> + O<sub>2</sub> = C<sub>20</sub>H<sub>30</sub>O<sub>2</sub> + H<sub>2</sub>O. Colophony varies in colour from light yellow to brown, according to the heat at which it has been prepared. It softens at 70° and melts at 135°; at higher temperatures it gives off volatile oils, and yields colopholic acid. When distilled in iron retorts it gives off gases, and a yellow strong smelling liquid distils over, called essence of resin, which yields by fractional distillation colophonone, and then as optically indifferent camphene, boiling at 160°, and afterwards a viscid fluorescent oil, called rosin oil, which, when treated with quicklime, has the formula C<sub>20</sub>H<sub>40</sub>O. Colophony is used for making varnishes and cements, in preparing ointments, and as a reducing agent in the soldering of metals, for adulterating soap, and for rubbing the bows of violins. Colophony distilled with lime in retorts gives off gases of the paraffin series, also propylene, amylene, acetone, and a substance having the formula C<sub>8</sub>H<sub>16</sub>O. When colophony is distilled with superheated steam at a comparatively low temperature, benzene is produced in considerable quantity, and at a higher temperature, toluene. Colophony, oxidised in a retort by one part nitric acid and two parts water, yields isophthalic and tremellitic acids. The syrupy mother liquid, treated with fuming nitric acid, yields a crystalline mass of terebic acid. (Watts: Dict. Chem.)

A. As substantive:

1. Literally:

(1) Any one of the primary lines seen in the spectrum, or a combination of a part or all of the same. [II. 1.]

(2) That quality of bodies by virtue of which (by absorbing certain rays of light and reflecting or emitting others) they present different appearances in respect of hue or tint to the eye.

(3) The complexion or hue of the face; the appearance of freshness or blood in the face.

(4) The material pigments used for coloring.

(5) Any tint or hue, as distinguished from black or white; in botany, any hue except green.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A representation, character, or description; an outward cover or form.

"... to put false colors upon things, to call good evil and evil good, . . ."—Swift.

(2) A pretence, an excuse, a false show or appearance, a subterfuge.

"Thus malice under the color of justice is had." Gower, l. 62.

(3) An excuse or palliation of a fault; a cover. "But yet we want a color for his death." Shakespeare: 2 Hen. VI., III. 1.

(4) A character, a kind or species. "Boys and women are, for the most part, cattle of this color."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, III. 2.

* (5) The face.

(6) A color used as the badge of any party or side; as college colors. [II. 7 (2).]

(7) Applied euphemistically to members of those races of mankind whose skin is of a dark color; as people of color (negroes).

II. Technically:

1. Optics: Color in optics is viewed chiefly in connection with the solar spectrum. When the white line which reaches us from the sun passes from one medium into another, the phenomenon of dispersion takes place, that is, the light is decomposed into several colors. They are generally stated to be seven in number, viz., violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange, and red. As these may be produced when light is transmitted through a prism, they are generally called prismatic colors. They are not all equally refrangible, the violet being the most so and the orange the least. On the theory of Sir Isaac Newton, who was the first to decompose white light by the prism and again recombine it, bodies decompose light also by reflection, and their color depends on their reflecting power for the different simple colors. Those which reflect all colors in the proportion in which they exist in the spectrum are white; those which reflect none are black. Between these two limits there are infinite numbers of tints, according to the greater or less extent to which bodies reflect some colors and absorb others. On this theory, or hypothesis, bodies have no color in themselves, but these are produced by the kind of light which they reflect. (Genet.) Some colors are complementary to each other. [COMPLEMENTARY.] A simple color is one which cannot be decomposed.

2. Bot.: The tissue of plants is for the most part colorless, of a silvery white, or an exceedingly pale yellow. The cause of the subsequent color is the action of the solar light which produces chlorophyll (q.v.). When no abnormal causes are present to alter its action, this makes the epidermis of every part of the plant, except that of the flower, green. When plants naturally green become variegated it is generally a diseased state, though capable of being transmitted to the posterity of the plant. The researches of De Candolle have shown that there are two series of colors in plants, a cyanic and a xanthic one. The former is called, by Schuttler and Frank, the oxidized series, and the latter the deoxidized one.

Under the cyanic series of colors are to be ranked red, orange-red, orange-yellow, yellow, yellow-green, then green, occurring specially in the leaves of plants, stands as a connecting link between the two series, whilst under the xanthic series are to be placed blue-green, blue, blue-violet, violet-red, and red. [COLORING MATTER.] Prof. Dickie, of Aberdeen, has traced beautiful relations between form and color in the corollas of plants. [COROLLA.]

Bischoff, Lindley, &c., considered that there are, in botanical terminology, eight principal colors, under which all others may be arranged—white, gray, black, brown, yellow, green, blue, and red. For subdivisions of these see the words themselves. Note, however, should be taken of the fact that the adjective colored has a special botanical signification inconsistent with this arrangement. [COLORED, Bot.]

3. Painting: The coloring pigments used by painters.

4. Dyeing: Colors used in dyeing are of two kinds—adjective colors, those which require the use of a mordant, and substantive colors, in which no mordant is required.

5. Phres.: That faculty which is supposed to give the power of perceiving and appreciating colors and their various shades.

6. Music:

(1) A term variously employed in mediæval treatises on music to represent: a repetition of a sound in part musico (repetitio sjuodem vocie); purity of tone (pulchritudo soni); a movement of the voice from the part (florificatio vocie); an alteration of rhythm by different voices (idem sonus repetitus in tempore diverso a diverso vocibus); a discord purposely introduced for the sake of variety (aliquando unus eorum ponitur in discordantiam propter colorem musica). Some have gathered from the definition—"Repetitio diversæ vocis est idem sonus repetitus in tempore diverso a diversis vocibus," that a musical canon is meant to be described.

(2) Now, the melodic, harmonic, and rhythmic effects giving specific character to a musical composition.

(3) The colored lines first used for the purpose of rendering newnes more intelligible. "Quamvis perfecta sit postura novarum, caeca omnino est et nihil valet sine adjunctione litterarum vel colorum" (Guido). [ULTRA, NOTATION.]

7. Military:

* (1) The cognizance or insignia of a knight. (2) The flag, ensign, or standard of an army, fleet, or regiment (only in the plural).

¶ The plural form is occasionally (and very questionably) used with a singular article.

"An author compares a ragged coin to a tattered color."—Addison.

¶ To fear no colors: Properly a military expression—to fear no enemy; hence, to have no fear.

"O! He that is well hanged in this world, needs fear no colors." Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, I. 5.

8. Printing: Ink of any shade.

9. Law:

(1) An appearance or prima facie right, or appearance of title, furnishing a reasonable ground for action.

(2) A probable but really false plea, the design of which was to draw the decision of the case from the jury to the judge, by making the point so decided to appear to be one of law and not of fact. (Ogilvie).

¶ Color of office:

"Law: An act unjustly done through the countenance of an office, which is given as a colorable pretext for it when its real origin is corruption.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between color, hue, and tint: "Color is here the generic term; hue and tint are but modes of color; the former of which expresses a faint or blended color; the latter a shade of color. Betwixt the colors of black and brown, as of all other leading colors, there are various hues and tints, by the due intermixture of which natural objects are rendered beautiful." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) color-bearer, s. One who carries the flag or colors (of a regiment, &c.).

B. As adj.: (See the compounds).

color-blind, s. Affected with, or suffering from, color-blindness.

color-blindness, s. A peculiar defect of sight in which those who are affected are incapable of distinguishing different colors. Some see everything either to be light or dark, and have no conception of any other colors. This condition is, however, happily rare. Others, again, cannot distinguish either the primary colors from each other or from the secondary, confounding red with blue, blue with green, &c. It is calculated that about 4 per cent. of males and 5 per cent. of females of the people of the United States and Europe suffer from some form of this defect. An English chemist named Dalton, who suffered from color-blindness, was the first (1794) to draw attention to it, and hence the affection is frequently called Daltonism. [DALTONISM.]

color-box, s. A box for holding artists' colors, brushes, &c.; also, a vessel holding the colors employed in printing calicoes; a device for combining designated spectral colors in specific proportion.

color-chest, s. On shipboard, a receptacle for the various signal flags.

color-de-roy, s. [Fr. couleur de roy— "in old time, purple; now the bright tawny" (Colgrave).]

"Ane gown of colour-de-roy . . ."—Aberd. Reg., A. 1543, v. 15.

(1) A roller of gun-metal or steel pressed against the face of the engraved roll for calico-printing, and receiving a tremulous motion to slightly abrade the copper surface and enable it to hold the color more effectually.

(2) A sharp-edged ruler of gun-metal presented at a tangent upon the engraved cylinder of the calico-printing machine. The doctor acts as a wiper to hold back superfluous color, and has a slight reciprocating motion in contact with the surface of the cylinder. A hot-doctor on the other or delivery side of the roller removes fibres of cotton from the cylinder. [DUCTOR.]

color-guard, s.

Military: A detachment whose duty it is to guard the colors. In the U. S. Army the regimental color-guard consists of one sergeant, who is the color-bearer, and two experienced soldiers selected by the colonel.

color-line, s. A distinction more or less closely drawn between the white and black races as to social relations, &c. (U. S.)

color-man, s. One who prepares and deals in artists' colors, brushes, &c. (English.)

color-plate, s. An engraved plate from which is printed one of the colors making up a combination in imitation of lithography; generally produced by the half-tone process.

color-printing, s. Printing by a succession of colors, or by various colors copying parts of the sheet. There are various modes. One of the latest is as follows: The red, yellow, and blue are separately photographed by a secret process; from these negatives three plates are made by the half-tone method, and upon printing from them successively the subject is reproduced in all its original hues by the blending of these three primary colors. [CHROMATIC PRINTING.]

color-sergeant, s.

Milit.: The sergeant appointed to carry or guard the colors. [COLOR-GUARD.]

color-top, s. A top painted in various colors so as to show, in its rotation, the effect of their combination.

color-wheel, s. A wheel constructed with disks bearing various colors, which, being rotated, displays the effect of combined colors.

cōl'-ōr, cōl'-ōur, *coloryn, *colowren, v.t. & i. [COLOR, s.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To give a new color, hue, or tint to; to cause to assume any color or tint; to change the color of; to tinge, to paint, to dye.

2. Figuratively:

* (1) To palliate or excuse; to conceal. "He colors the falsehood of Æneas by an express command from Jupiter to forsake the queen."—Dryden: Dedication to Æneid.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōvī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, exist. ph = ç. -cian, -tian, = çhan. -tion -sion = çhūn; -çion, -çion = çhūn. -cious, -çious, -çious = çhūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = çpl, çpl.

(2) To make plausible or specious.
 "We have scarce heard of an insurrection that was not colored with violence of the highest kind, . . ."
 —Addison: Freeholder.

(3) To dress up or present under fair colors or appearances.
 ". . . but they must not be permitted to color our reports, or to induce our acceptance of reports of occurrences in external nature."—Tyn dall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), ill. 48.

(4) To modify in tone or character; as, one's opinions are colored by his environments.
 "II. Old English law:
 § To color a stranger's goods: To allow a foreigner to enter goods at the custom-house in a freeman's name, so that the foreigner pays but single duty, when he ought to pay double. (Phillips).

B. Intransitive:
 1. To assume a new color; to become colored.
 2. To blush (often followed by the adverb up).

cól'ór-á-ble, a. [Eng. color; -able.]
 1. That may be colored.
 2. Specious, plausible; apparent and not real.
 3. Appearing just and true, but not yet so proven.

Crabb thus distinguishes between colorable, specious, plausible, feasible, and ostensible: "What is colorable has an aspect or face upon it that lulls suspicion and affords satisfaction; what is specious has a fair outside when contrasted with that which it may possibly conceal; what is ostensible is that which presents such an appearance as may serve for an indication of something real; what is plausible is that which meets the understanding merely through the ear; that which is feasible recommends itself from its intrinsic value rather than from any representation given of it. A pretence is colorable when it has the color of truth impressed upon it; it is specious when its fallacy is easily discernible through the thin guise it wears; a motive is ostensible which is the one soonest to be discovered; an excuse is plausible when the well-connected narrative of the maker impresses a belief of its justice; an account is feasible which contains nothing improbable or singular." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ A colorable alteration:
 Common law: One made chiefly in connection with the law of copyright.

cól'ór-á-bil'í-tý, s. The state of being colorable.

cól'ór-á-ble-néss, s. [Eng. colorable; -ness.] The quality of being colorable; plausibility, speciousness.

cól'ór-á-blý, adv. [Eng. colorable; -ly.] In a colorable or specious manner; plausibly, speciously; apparently and not really.

Cól'ór-á-dó, s. [Sp. = red.]
Geog.: A territory of the United States which was separated from Utah and Kansas and organized as a distinct territory in 1861. It was admitted as a State in 1876. Its capital is Denver. Colorado is one of the most important mining States in the Union, producing both gold and silver in large and increasing quantities.

Colorado-beetle, s.
Entom.: A beetle first described by Thomas Say, in 1824, from specimens found by him near the Upper Missouri. He called it Doryphora decemlineata. The genus Doryphora had been previously founded by Illiger. It comes from Gr. doryphoros (doryphoros) = spear-bearing, the reference being to the fact that to these insects the mesosternum is advanced to a point like a horn. The genus is American, and is placed under the Chrysomelidae. The larva of the species distinguished as decemlineata feeds greedily on the potato, and having attracted notice in Colorado for its ravages among the crops of that esulent in the territory, it moved eastward year by year, till in 1874 it had reached the Atlantic sea-board. Between 1874 and 1876 Canada was ravaged. It is destroyed by dusting the plants with Paris green, which method has proved so effective that comparatively little damage is now done by this pest. [POTATO-BUG.]

COLOREADO-BEETLE.

cól'ór-ánt, s. Any material or dye used in coloring.

*cól'ór-áte, a. [Lat. coloratus, pa. par. of coloro = to color; color = color.] Colored, dyed, marked, or stained with a color.

A. As adj.: Pertaining to Colosse or Colossai, a city or town on the Lycus, a tributary of the Meander. It was in the immediate vicinity of Laodicea and Hierapolis. In the first century of the Christian era it was declining as the two other cities rose.

B. As subst.: An inhabitant of Colosse. (Used generally in the plural.)

† Epistle to the Colossians:

Scripture Canon: An epistle addressed by St. Paul to the Church of Colosse. Its genuineness and authenticity are amply supported by quotations from it in the writings of Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, besides allusions to it by Justin Martyr and Theophilus of Antioch. Most modern critics are in its favour, the chief exceptions being Meyerhoff and Banr. The epistle was written probably at Rome, in or near the year A. D. 62, though some have thought it was penned earlier, and at Caesarea. The Church at Colosse seems to have had as its founder Epaphras, a native of the place (Col. i. 7, iv. 12, 13), who is probably a different person from the Epaphroditus of Philip. ii. 25. Epaphras having carried Paul at Rome intelligence regarding the state of the Colossian Church (i. 8), Paul penned the present epistle, despatching it by the hands of Tychicus (iv. 7, 8), who carried also with him that to the Ephesians (Eph. vi. 21). Onesimus at the same time was returning with a message to his master, Philemon, who lived at Colosse (Philem. 10, Col. iv. 9). There is a striking resemblance between many passages in the epistle to the Colossians and that to the Ephesians, but there are differences too. The epistle to the Colossians appears to have been penned first, and that to the Ephesians a few days later.

The Colossian Church seems to have been mainly Gentile (i. 25—27, ii. 11—13, iii. 5—7), but at the time when the apostle wrote it was troubled by converts from Judaism, who sought to impose the yoke of ceremonial observance on their Gentile brethren (ii. 10—17), in addition to which doctrines were advocated by the same or by other individuals regarding angels and such supernatural beings, in which may be discerned the germ of gnosticism (ii. 18—23). These opinions St. Paul earnestly combats, contending for Christian liberty and for the supreme dignity of Christ. According to Eusebius, Colosse was destroyed by an earthquake the year succeeding that in which this epistle was written.

† Colossian (as Col-lōsh'-an) (2), a. & s. [From Lat. colossus (q. v.); c. connective, and Eng. suff. -ian.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to a colossus, colossean.

Any snake of the family Colubridæ (q.v.).

col'-ü-brí-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. coluber (genit. colubri), and suff. -idæ.]

Zool. : A family of Serpents belonging to the sub-order Ophidians (q.v.). The head is generally shielded, the nostrils apical, lateral open, the belly covered with broad band-like shields, the vent without any, the tail conical and tapering. Typical genus Coluber (q.v.).

col-lü-brí-form, a. [COLUBRIFORMES.]

Belonging to, or characteristic of, the Colubriformes (q.v.).

"Innocuous colubri-form snakes."—Cassell's Nat Hist. (ed. Doucan), IV. 221.

col-lü-brí-for-mēs, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. coluber (genit. colubri), and Lat. forma = shape.]

Zool. : The same as Colubrina.

col'-ü-brí-næ (1), s. pl. [Lat. neut. pl. of colubrinus = like a serpent.]

Zool. : A sub-order of Ophidians (Serpents). They have strong jaws, with long maxillary bones and solid conical teeth, sometimes interspersed with imperforate fangs, fixed immovably in the mouth. The sub-order may be divided thus:—

Section I. Innocua maxillary bones armed only with solid teeth. The snakes of this section are innocuous. Families: (1) Colubridæ, (2) Boidæ, and (3) Tortricidæ.

Section II. Maxillary bones having solid teeth, mixed with long grooved fangs. Sub-section 1. Venosæ. Fangs placed at the anterior part of the maxillary bones, with the solid teeth behind them. Undoubtedly venomous. Families: (1) Elapsidæ, and (2) Hydrophidæ. Sub-section 2. Suspectæ. Fangs situated at the back of the jaw, behind the common teeth. Suspected to be venomous. Families: (1) Homalopsidæ, (2) Dipsadidæ, and (3) Dendrophidæ.

col'-ü-brí-næ (2), s. [Lat. colubrina = a plant, called also bryonia and dracutia. This is not the modern botanical use of the word.]

Bot. : A genus of plants, order Rhamnaceæ. Colubrina fermentum, a native of Guinea, is called Fermented Snake-wood. Its bitter bark is said to bring on fermentation in the liquora into which it is thrown.

col'-ü-brine, a. & s. [Lat. colubrinus.]

- A. As adjective :
1. Gen. : Relating to a serpent.
2. Spec. : Belonging to, or characteristic of, the sub-order Colubrina (q.v.).

"The Naja Haje, a venomous Colubrine Snake."—Nicholson : Zool., p. 520.

¶ Colubrine Snakes :

Zool. : Ophidians of the sub-order Colubrina (q.v.), especially of Section I.

"The three most important groups of the existing Ophidians are the Colubrine Snakes, the Constricting Snakes, and the Viperine Snakes."—Nicholson : Fauna, II. 19.

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

I. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 1.

"Some of the old Greek columns and altars were brought from the ruins of Apollo's temple at Delos."—Peacocks.

2. Fig.: Anything resembling or supposed to resemble a column, in pressing vertically on its base.

"... an angel, who, at last, in sight of both my parents, all in flames ascended from off the altar where an offering burnt, As in a fiery column charioting His godlike presence."
Milton: Samson Agonistes.

"The whole weight of any column of the atmosphere."—Bentley.

II. Technically:

I. Arch.: A pillar, shaft, or solid body of considerably greater length than thickness, standing upright, and generally serving to support some superincumbent mass. It is the principal part in the ancient orders of architecture. There are five orders of architecture, each having its own proper style of column. [ARCHITECTURE.] The Grecian-Doric has no base, and in some other respects differs from the Roman-Doric, which is an imitation of it. It was short, powerful, and massive, and very simple in character. Its height was between seven and eight diameters. The Ionic column was distinguished by its volutes, and was nine diameters in height. The Corinthian, which was ten diameters high, was adorned with leaves, &c., and was noted for its lightness and richness of decoration. Of these the Doric and Ionic were the earliest and oftenest employed in Greek architecture.

The Corinthian was preferred by the Romans. The parts of a column are: (1) the plinth, (2) the torus, (3) the shaft, (4) the astragal, (5) the neck, (6) the ovato, (7) the abacus (see these words). Above these rose the entablature.

COLUMN.

2. Anat.: The name given to various pillar-like structures of the bodily frame. Thus the posterior vesicular column is the name given by Clarke to a compact group of large cells occupying the inner half of the cervix in the posterior cornu in the spinal cord. (Quain.)

¶ Column is the English rendering of colonna, and columna of columnæ, which are used as anatomical terms. [COLUMNA, COLUMNÆ.]

3. Zoology:

- (1) The cylindrical body of a Sea-anemone.
- (2) The jointed stem or peduncle of a stalked crinoid. The axis of a crinoid which, when the fleshy envelope is removed, separates into a multitude of joints or pieces.

4. Bot.: A solid body into which the filaments in some plants, such as Stapelia, Styldium, and Rafflesia, are combined. In the Orchids, Richard called the column a gynostemium. (Lindley.)

5. Military:

(1) A body of troops in deep files and narrow front, opposed to line, which is extended in front and thin in depth.

(2) A body of troops, irrespective of the manner of formation.

"But the clan, deprived of the leader whom it adored, and aware that he had withdrawn himself in ill humour, was no longer the same terrible column which had a few days before kept so well the vow to perish or to conquer."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xlii.

6. Nautical: (See extract.)

"A column means any number of ships in a distinct group, whether in line-ahead, abreast, or otherwise. A column is said to be in line ahead when the ships are in one line ahead of each other. A column is said to be in line abreast when the ships are ranged in one line abreast of each other."—Manual of Naval Evolutions; Defn., pp. 30-1. (1874.)

7. Printing, Writing, &c.: A perpendicular set of lines separated from another set by a line or blank space; as, A column of print, a column of figures, &c.

8. Distilling: A vessel containing a vertical series of chambers used in stills for continuous distillation. (Knight.)

9. Calico-printing: The name of a certain description of steam apparatus by which steam is applied to cloths typically treated with a mixture of dye-extracts and mordants, in order to fix the colours. (Knight.)

B. As adj.: (See the compounds.)

column-lathe, s. A dentist's or watch-maker's lathe on a vertical extensible post to accommodate an operator in a sitting or standing posture. (Knight.)

column-like, a. Like or resembling a column.

cōl-ūm-nif-ēr-ōus, a. [COLUMNIFERÆ.]

Bot.: Having the filaments of the stamens united into a column, as in the Mallows.

cōl-ūm-nŷ-la, s. [Lat. columnella, dim. of columna = a column.] A little column, used esp. in anatomy.

† cō-lŷre, s. [Lat. coluris, pl.; Gr. κόλουροι (kolourōi) (see def.), κόλουρος (kolourōs) = dock-tailed, stump-tailed, truncated; κόλος (kolos) = docked, stunted, οὐρά (oura) = tail.]

Astronomy: Of the two circles [2.], viz., the equinoctial colure, the solstitial colure.

2. Pl.: Two great circles passing through the equinoctial points and cutting each other at right angles at the poles. The term colure, which was used by the ancients, being unnecessary, is not much employed.

* cō-lŷs, s. [Gr. κόλος (kolos) = an unknown quadruped.]

Zool.: A lapsed synonym of ΣΑΙΓΑ (q.v.).

cō-lŷ-tē-a, s. [Class. Lat. colutea; Gr. κολούτεια (koloutea) = a pod-bearing tree mentioned by Theophrastus.]

Bot.: A genus of Papilionaceæ plants, sub-tribe Galegeæ. Colutea arborea is the Bladder Senna, the leaves of which are used for adulterating the blunt-leaved Senna of the druggists.

* col-ver, s. [CULVER.]

cōl-vil-lē-a, s. [Named after Sir Charles Colville, formerly Governor of the Mauritius.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous trees, sub-order Cæsalpinieæ. Colvillea racemosa is a splendid tree forty or fifty feet high, with scarlet flowers, a native of Madagascar.

cōl-ŷ, s. [COLIC.]

cōl-ŷ-dī-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. colydium (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Pentamerous Beetles.

cōl-ŷ-dī-ūm, s. [The form seems that of a diminutive. Agassiz considers the root to be Gr. κολέος (koléos) = a sheath.]

Entom.: A genus of beetles, the typical one of the family Colydiidæ. One species is British, Colydium elongatum.

cōl-ŷm-bē-tēs, s. [Gr. κολυμβητής (kolymbētēs) = a diver, a swimmer.]

Entom.: A genus of water-beetles, family Dytiscidæ. Eight species are found in Britain.

cōl-ŷm-bī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. colymbus, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Pygopodes (q.v.). The beak is somewhat long, conical, and pointed. There is sometimes a crest on the head, the wings are short, and the hinder toe is distinct. The feet are placed far back, so that the bird has to stand erect. Most are marine; others frequent estuaries, and even fresh water, especially in severe weather. The family sometimes includes the Grebes, but is more generally restricted to the genus Colymbus (q.v.).

† cōl-ŷm-bī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. colymbus, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

cōl-ŷm-bŷs, s. [Gr. κόλυμβος (kolumbōs) = a diver, a swimmer.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds, the typical one of the family Colymbidæ. Colymbus glacialis is the northern diver or loon.

cōl-za, s. [Fr. Brassica Napus, var. oleifera.]

colza oil, s. Oil from its seeds. Used for burning in lamps.

cōm-, pref. in compos. [Lat. cum = with.] The form assumed by the Latin prefix before words beginning with b, p, or m, and sometimes before f. [CO, CON.]

* com, s. [COME.] A coming, an arrival, an advent.

"Blyssyd he that swete blome,
That shalle save us at his com."—Towneley Myet., p. 62.

* com, pref. of v. [COME.]

cō-ma (1), s. [Gr. κόμα (kōma) = deep slumber; κοίμα (koimā) = to lull or hush to sleep, to put to sleep; cognate with κείμαι (keimai) = to lie, to lie outstretched.]

Med.: A morbid state which, if considered a distinct disease, is a milder form of apoplexy but which may be properly regarded as a symptom rather than an idiopathic affection. It is characterised by a morbid condition of the brain, producing loss of sensation and voluntary motion, so that the patient seems as if in a deep sleep. It constitutes the most pronounced state of torpor which can occur, the succession being as follows: When a patient is so overcome by lassitude that he tends perpetually to sleep, is incapable of muscular exertion, and cannot, except when excited, give attention to what is passing around, his state is called lethargy; when a mechanical stimulus, such as that of pricking or pinching him, will restore him to partial consciousness, it is curus; when not even this will rouse him, it is coma. The cerebral functions are suspended in coma, and the nervous and sanguiferous systems deranged. There are two well-marked types of it, one in which the pulse is oppressed, irregular, and slow; and the other in which it is strong, with a hot skin and other marks of febrile inflammation. When coma is intense it passes into apoplexy (q.v.).

"The condensation of the substance of the hemisphere, which is produced by an apoplectic clot or by the effusion of some other foreign matter, prevents a similar consent of action, and thus gives rise to the phenomena of coma, in which all mental nervous actions are destroyed or suspended."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. 11, p. 364.

cō-ma (2), a. [Lat. = hair, foliage, grass.]

1. Astronomy: (1) Gen.: Anything more or less hair-like. [COMA BERENICUS.]

(2) Spec.: A certain hair-like appearance seen surrounding the nucleus, considered as the head, of a comet when the spectator stands between it and the sun.

2. Botany: (1) The assemblage of branches constituting the head of a forest tree.

(2) A series of empty bracts terminating the inflorescences of some plants.

(3) The tuft of hairs terminating certain seeds as, for example, the long hairs collected about the extremity of the cotton and some other plants. These have been sometimes improperly called the pappus. [COMOSE.]

3. Micros.: The blurred appearance round the edges of an object, due to spherical aberration.

Coma Berenices, s. [BERENICE'S HAIR.]

cō-mal (1), a. [Eng. coma (1); -al.]

Med.: Proceeding from, or pertaining to, coma (q.v.).

cō-mal (2), a. [Eng. coma (2); -al.] Hair-like.

* cō-mart, s. [? Pref. co = con, and mart (q.v.). More probably a misprint for com'nat, which is the reading found in the first folio.] A treaty or agreement.

"By the same comart,
And carriage of the articles design'd,
His fel. to Hamlet."—Shakeesp.: Ham., 1. 1.

cōm-ar-ūm, s. [From Lat. comarus; Gr. κόμαρος (komaros) = the strawberry-tree (Arbutus unedo).]

Bot.: An old genus of plants belonging to the order Rosaceæ or Roseworts, and now absorbed in Potentilla (q.v.) [MARSH CINQUEFOIL.]

cō-māte, a. [Lat. comatus = hairy, pa. par. of com = to cover with hair; comā = hair.]

1. Surrounded by coma; having a hairy appendage like a tail.

"How comate, crinote, cadate stars are fram'd."—Pastor: Tasso, xiv. 44.

2. Bot.: Comose (q.v.).

3. Entom.: Covered, more or less, on the upper surface with long flexible hairs.

† cō-māte, s. [Pref. co = con, and mate (q.v.).] A companion, associate, or partner; a fellow-mate.

"And thy name, stranger!—Is Iolinthos, the comate in the prison, as the trial."—Sir E. L. Bulwer: Last Days of Pompeii, bk. 1, ch. xvi.

cō-mā-tōse, cō-mā-toŷs, a. [Fr. coma-teux; Lat. coma; Gr. κόμα (kōma) = sleep, lethargy.] [COMA (1), s.] In a state of, or pertaining to, coma; lethargic, drowsy.

"Our best actor is from Russia; the great and principal use whereof, is in hysterical and comatose cases."—Grew.

cōm-āt-n-la, s. [Lat. comatulus = having hair neatly or luxuriantly curled; dimn. of comatus = hairy; coma = hair.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sār, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rāle, fāll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

Zool. : A genus of Echinoderms, the typical one of the family Comatulidae. One species, Comatula (or Antedon) rosea, is found in the British seas. Its young are so unlike the mature animal that they were placed in a distinct family and called Pentacrinus europaeus.

com-māt'-u-līd, s. [COMATULIDÆ.] Any individual of the Comatulidae (q.v.).

com-a-tū'-lī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. comatula, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zool. : A family of Echinoderms, order Crinoidea. They are called Hair-stars and Feather-stars. They are fixed by a stalk when young, but are free when of mature age, differing in this respect from the Encrinuridae or Seallies, which were attached by stalks at every period of their existence. They have both the mouth and anus on the lower or ventral surface, possess ten slender arms and slender-jointed cirri, enabling them to creep about at the bottom of the sea. Species have been found in most parts of the world. [COMATULA.]

2. Palæont. : Free Crinoids, like the modern Comatula, appear first apparently in the Jurassic rocks.

com-aund, com-awnd, com-awn-dyn, s. & v. [COMAND.]

comb (1), s. [COMBE.]

comb (2) (b silent), *camb, *combe (2), *coomb (1), *kambe, *komb (Eng.), *kame, *kayme (Scotch), s. & a. [A.S. comb = a comb, a crest; Dan. & Dut. kambo; Icel. kamb; Sw. kam; O. H. Ger. kambo, champe; M. H. Ger. kamp; Ger. kamm.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A toothed instrument used for separating, arranging, or dressing the hair; also an ornamental toothed contrivance used by ladies for keeping the hair in its place when dressed.

"And fair Igea's golden comb, Wherewith she sits on diswood rocks, Steeking her soft alluring locks."
Milton: Comus, 280-2.

2. The top or crest of a bird, especially of a cock.

"Combe or other lyke of byrdyn."—Prompt. Parv.

"High was his comb, and coral-red withal, With dewes embattled like a castle wall."
Dryden: The Cock and Fox.

*3. The crest or top of a wave.

*4. A ridge of earth or land, an embankment.

"If that fole hem wulde deren,
The dikes comb hem wulde weren."
Story of Genesis & Exodus, 2, 563.

5. The waxen hexagonal cavities in which bees lodge their honey.

"A comb of honey."—Wycliffe: Luke xxiv. 22.

"... when the bee doth leave her comb."
Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4.

* The comb of a bee is composed, as stated above, of hexagonal cells, of which there are two tiers, the cells in which are placed end to end, so that the three plates of wax, which serve as the bottom of the cell in the one tier, constitute also the top of the corresponding one in the other. The mathematical problem in "maxima and minima," how to construct the greatest number of cells within the smallest possible room, and with the least expenditure of material, is solved. This the natural theologians and the older naturalists were scenotomized to adduce, as one of an infinite number of proofs, that design and a Designer were displayed in nature. [DESIGN.]

II. Technically:

1. Naut. : A small piece of timber under the lower part of the beam-head, for the fore-tack to be hauled to—in some vessels, instead of a buntin; it has the same use in bringing the fore-tack on board that the chess-tree has to the main tack. (Smyth.)

2. Milit. : The projecting piece on the top of the cock of a gun-lock which affords the thumb a convenient hold for drawing it back.

3. Wool-dressing, &c. :

(1) A rake-shaped implement, consisting of a head with two or three rows of tapering steel teeth, the rows being of different lengths. The tool is used in combing long-stapled wool for worsted goods. The combs are used in pairs. Short-stapled wool is carded.

(2) The serrated doffing-knives which remove the fleece from the doffing-cylinder of a carding-machine. (Knight.)

4. Hat-making : The former on which a fleece of fibre is taken up and hardened into a hat. Probably from cone, the usual shape. (Knight.)

5. Mechanics :

(1) A steel tool with teeth corresponding to those of a screw, and used for chasing screws on work which is rotated in a lathe. [CHASER.]

(2) The notched scale of a wire-micrometer.

B. As adj. : (See the compounds.)

¶ Compounds of obvious signification : Comb-case, comb-maker, comb-making.

comb-broach, s. The tooth of a comb, with which wool is dressed.

comb-brush, s.

1. Lit. : A brush for cleaning combs.

* 2. Fig. : A ladies'-maid.

"... with whom she had lived for some time in the capacity of a comb-brush."—Folding: Tom Jones, bk. xvii, ch. viii.

comb-cutter, s. One who makes combs. Comb-cutter's saw : Usually a double saw, in which two blades are affixed to one stock, one projecting beyond the other, and the less salient acting as a spacer to start the next kerf. Another comb-cutter's saw has an adjustable slip, which acts as a gauge for depth of kerf. [COMB-SAW.]

* comb-feat, s. A thrashing or beating.

"Come hither, I must show thee a new trick, and handsomely give thee the comb-feat."—Urquhart: Rabelais, bk. ii, ch. vi. (Davies.)

comb-frame, s. A four-square removable frame like a slate-frame, placed in a hive to be filled with honeycomb. (Knight.)

comb-pot, s. A stove at which the combs are warmed in the operation of preparing long-stapled wool for worsted.

comb-saw, s. The hand-saw of the comb-cutter is called a stadda, and has two blades, one deeper than the other; a gauge on the saw-blade determines the depth of cut. Some of the saws are serrated on each edge. The blades are made of thick steel, and are ground sway on the edges as thin as the notches of the comb. They have about twenty points to the inch. Between the blades is a thin slip or tongue of metal, called a lanquet, which determines and preserves the intervals. (Knight.)

comb-shaped, a.

Bot. : Pectinate, pinnatifid, but with the segments very numerous, close, and narrow, like the tooth of a comb. Example, the leaf of Lavandula dentata.

comb (3), coomb (2), s. [A.S. cumb (?) (Bosworth).] A corruption of Fr. comble = (s.) s heaping, (a.) heaped up, quite full; from Lat. cumulatus, pa. par. of cumulo = to heap up. (Skeat.) A dry measure containing four bushels.

"In the fourteenth century, Sir Jehu Callum observed, a harvestman had fourpence a day, which enabled him to buy a comb of wheat; but to buy a comb of wheat a man must now (1784) work ten or twelve days."—Hallam: View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, pt. ii, ch. ix.

comb (4), s. [COLMIE.] A coal-fish of the fifth year. (Scotch.)

comb (b silent), *kembe, *kemo, *kemyn, v. t. & i. [A.S. cemban; Icel. kemba; O. H. Ger. chempen; M. H. Ger. kemben, kemmen.] [COMB (2), s.]

A. Transitive :

1. Ord. Lang. : To dress, arrange, or adjust the hair with a comb.

"One of them combed his flowing wig . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

2. Comm. : To clean and arrange wool, to card.

"Kemo wulle or others lyke. Pectina."—Prompt. Parv.

"As a sliether kemba her wolle."—Langland: P. Plowman, 5, 631.

¶ To comb the cat :

Naut. : To adjust the tails of the cat by running the fingers between them.

To comb one's head : To give one a thrashing.

"A wife who will comb your head for you."—Lytton: What Will He Do with It, bk. iv, ch. xvi.

* B. Intrans. : To form into a crest, to roll over (as waves).

* comb-ba-cy, s. [COMBAT.] A combat or fight.

"By comba to winne or lose."—Warner: Albion's England, bk. iv.

comb-bat, v. i. & t. [G. Fr. combatre; Fr. combatre: com = with, and batre = to beat or strike, from Lat. batus; Ital. combattere; Sp. combatir; Port. combater.]

A. Intransitive :

1. Lit. : To contend, to engage or fight with, to struggle against physically, to meet in opposition or enmity.

"No more to combat and to bleed."
Byron: Maseppa, l.

2. Fig. : To struggle or resist mentally.

"His face still combating with tears and smiles."
Shakespeare: Rich. II., v. 2

B. Transitive :

1. Lit. : To oppose, to struggle or contend against, to engage with physically.

"When he the ambitious Norway combated."
Shakespeare: Hamlet, l. 1.

2. Fig. : To oppose, struggle, or contend against mentally or by argument.

"... held himself equally bound to combat religious errors."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

comb-bāt, s. [COMBAT, v.]

I. Ordinary Language :

1. Lit. : An engagement, contest, or conflict; a struggle with or opposition to any person or thing.

2. Fig. : A mental struggle.

"The noble combat that, 'twixt joy and sorrow, was fought in Paulina!"—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, v. 2

II. Technically :

1. Military :

(1) A duel, an engagement between two armed persons; now generally spoken of as a single combat.

"And I accept the combat willingly."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., i. 2

(2) A skirmish, an engagement between two opposing forces of small numbers.

2. Law : [For trial by single combat, see BATTLE, B. 1.]

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between combat and oppose : "Combat is properly a species of opposing; one always opposes in combating, though not vice versa . . . a person's positions are combated, his interests or his measures are opposed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ For the difference between combat and battle, see BATTLE; for that between combat and conflict, see CONFLICT.

† comb-bat-a-ble, a. [Eng. combat; -able.] That may be combated or disputed; disputable. (Todd.)

comb-bat-ant, a. & s. [Fr. combattant, pr. par. of combattre.] [COMBAT, v.]

A. As adjective :

1. Ord. Lang. : Engaged in combat, fighting, bearing arms, antagonistic.

"Their valours are not yet so combatant, Or truly antagonistic."
B. Jonson: Magn. Lady.

2. Her. : Applied to beasts borne on a coat of arms face to face, as in the attitude of fighting.

B. As substantive :

1. Lit. : One who fights or engages in battle or single combat; a soldier.

"Sold, trumpets; and set forward, combatants."—Shakespeare: Richard II., i. 2.

2. Fig. : One who contends for matters of opinion or belief; an advocate or champion of a cause.

"When any of these combatants strips his terms of ambiguity, I shall think him a champion for knowledge."—Locke.

¶ With for before the thing defended.

"Meu become combatants for those opinions."—Locke.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between combatant and champion : "Combatant fights for himself and for victory; a champion fights either for another, or in another's cause. The word combatant has always relation to some actual engagement; champion may be employed for one ready to be engaged, or in the habits of being engaged. The combatants in the Olympic games used to contend for a prize; the Roman gladiators were combatants."

bēl, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorn, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = çhün; -çion, -çion = çhün. -çious, -çious, -çious = çhūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

who fought for their lives: when knight errantry was in fashion, there were champions of all descriptions . . . The mere act of fighting constitutes the combatant: the act of standing up in another's defence at a personal risk constitutes the champion . . . (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōm'-bat-ēd, pa. par. or a. [COMBAT, v.]

† cōm'-bat-ēr, s. [Eng. combat; -er.] One who contends or opposes; a combatant.

cōm'-bat-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [COMBAT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of opposing, resisting, or struggling against.

† cōm'-bat-ive, a. [Eng. combat; suff. -ive.]

Inclined to combating or opposing, pugnacious. "This he puts upon you in his fine combative manner."—Lamb: Letter to Wordsworth.

cōm'-bat-ive-ness, s. [Eng. combative; -ness.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The quality of being combative or disposed to quarrel.

2. Phren.: One of the affective propensities. The organ of it is fixed on the hinder part of the head, one half of it just to the left of the upper margin of the right ear, the other half on the corresponding spot to the right of the left ear.

* cōm'-bat-ize, v.i. [Eng. combat; -ize.] To combat, to fight.

cōmbe, cōmb, s. [A.S. comb, cumb = s] valley; Fr. combe; Prov. & Sp. comba; Wel. cwym, cymran, cymydd, cymoedd. See def. [Cōma (1), a.] A hollow between two hills, a dale, a dingle, a valley, a ravine. Used—

† 1. As an independent word.

"... in sounding combe and plain."—W. Browne: Britannia's Pastorals.

2. As part of a compound word in many geographical names in the south-west of England, as Babbiccombe, Ilfracombe.

cōmbed (b silent), pa. par. or a. [COMB, v., KEMPT.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adj.: Furnished with a comb or crest.

cōm'-ēr (1) (b silent), s. [Eng. comb; -er.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who combs.

II. Technically:

1. Commerce:

(1) One who combs or cards wool.

(2) A machine for combing or carding wool.

2. Nautical:

(1) A heavy surge breaking on a beach, a long curling wave.

(2) A ledge around the well or passenger portion of a sail-boat to keep back spray and waves which "comb" over the deck.

cōm'-bēr (2), a. [Corn. dialect.]

Ichthy.: A local name for Serranus cabrilla and for Labrus maculatus, common on the southern and south-western coast.

* cōm'-bēr (3), s. [COMBER, s.]

* cōm-ber, * com-bren, v.t. [COMBER, v.]

* cōm'-bēr-ōus, a. [COMBROUS.]

† cōm'-bin'-a-ble, a. [Eng. combine(s); -able.]

Capable of combining or of being combined. "Pleasures are very combinable both with business and study."—Lord Chesterfield.

† cōm'-bin'-a-ble-ness, s. [Eng. combinable; -ness.]

The quality of being combinable or capable of combination.

cōm'-bi-nant, s. [Late Lat. combinans, genit. combinantis, pres. par. of combinō = to combine.]

Math.: A co-variant which remains unaltered when each quantic is replaced by a linear function of all the quantics. (Cayley.)

* cōm'-bin-āte, a. [Lat. combinatus, pa. par. of combinō = to combine (q.v.).] Betrothed, united, espoused.

cōm-bin-ā-tion, s. [Late Lat. combinatio; Fr. combinaison.] [COMBINE, v.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. The act or process of combining or uniting two or more substances or bodies.

"Resolution of compound bodies by fire, does not so much enrich mankind as it divides the bodies; as upon the score of its making new compounds by new combinations."—Boyle.

2. The state or condition of being combined; union, commixture.

"... from the moment of their first combination."—Hooker.

3. The result of the act or process of combining; a combined body or mass.

4. A union, association, or league of persons or states for a certain purpose; a confederacy (generally used in a bad sense, as a cabal).

"Rome, by her warlike policy, was perpetually exposing herself to serious reverses, to vindictive attacks, and to formidable combinations of injured neighbours."—Levins: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1855), ch. xii., pt. 1, § 15, vol. II., p. 47.

II. Figuratively:

1. The act or process of combining ideas in the mind.

"They never suffer any ideas to be joined in their understandings, in any other or stronger combination than what their own nature and correspondence give them."—Locke.

2. The state or condition of being mentally combined or associated.

"Ingratitude is always in combination with pride and hard-heartedness."—South.

B. Technically:

1. Arith., Algebra, &c.: The different collections which may be made of certain given quantities without regard to the order in which they are arranged in each collection.

The term is almost always mentioned in conjunction with permutations in which there is regard to the order of the quantities, and a department of arithmetic is technically called Permutations and Combinations. If a, b, and c be three quantities to be taken two together, there will be three possible combinations, that is, ways of arranging them in pairs, without allowing b to stand before a, or c before the two letters which precede it in the alphabet. These combinations will be ab, ac, and bc. But there can be six permutations of the same three letters; i. e., six distinct pairs of them if permission be granted to put them in any order one pleases, viz., ab, ba, ac, ca, bc, cb. [PERMUTATION.]

2. Chem.: The act of uniting by means of chemical affinity; the state of being so united. There are two kinds of chemical combination, that by weight and that by volume. In a large number of instances the law relating to combination by weight is as follows:—When two bodies, A and B, are capable of uniting, the several quantities of B, which combine with a given or constant quantity of A, stand to one another in very simple ratios. [MULTIPLE (Chem.), EQUIVALENT, ATOMIC.] With regard to gases combining by volume, the law is that the combining volumes of all elementary gases are equal, excepting those of phosphorus and arsenic, which are only half those of the other elements in the gaseous state, and those of mercury and cadmium, which are double those of the other elements. (Fowles.)

"... we have then what is called a chemical combination."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), I. 10.

3. Law: A term defined as an "assembly of workmen met to perpetrate an unlawful act." From the time of Edward I., the law attempted to regulate the price of labour, and prohibit the workmen from combining. By 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 15, combinations to raise wages became severely punishable. These laws were repealed in 1825. Still, most of the objects aimed at by workmen's combinations were held to be in "restraint of trade," and therefore illegal, but at present trade unions are considered legitimate combinations, even if their action should in any case be deemed in restraint of trade. Interference with the freedom of action of those workmen who do not join them is not permitted; in all other respects they are free. Similar restraining laws were early passed in the United States; but they have been repealed, and workmen are quite free to combine. The only restriction is against violence.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between combination, conspiracy, cabal, and plot: "An association for a bad purpose is the idea common to all these terms, and peculiar to combination. A combination may be either secret or open, but secrecy forms a necessary part in the signification of the other terms; a cabal is secret as to its end; a plot and conspiracy are secret, both as to the means and the end. Combination is the close adherence of many for their mutual defence in obtaining of demands, or resisting of claims. A cabal is the intrigue of a party or faction, formed by cunning practices in order to give a turn to the course of things to its own advantage: the natural and ruling idea in cabal is that of assembling a number, and manoeuvring secretly with address. A plot is a "destine union of some persons for the purpose of mischief"; the ruling idea in a plot is that of a complicated enterprise formed in secret, by two or more persons. A conspiracy is a general intelligence among persons united in sentiment to effect some serious change: the ruling and natural idea in this word is that of unanimity and concert in the prosecution of a plan. A combination is seldom of an serious nature as a cabal, or a plot, though always objectionable; a combination may have many or few." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ Spontaneous combustion:

1. Ord. Lang.: Combustion occurring without any means taken on the part of man to produce it.

*cóm-búst-i-ous, a. [Eng. combust; -ious.] Combustible, inflammable.

"Here was comedy, a song of gestes firste founde."—Treviŷ, i. 315.

"I have not attempted anything of a pastoral comedy, because, I think, the taste of our age will not relish a poem of that sort."—Pope: Letter to H. Cromwell, July 2, 1705.

¶ Comedy took its origin in the Dionysian festivals, with those who led the phallic songs of the band of revellers (κῶμος) who, at the vintage festivals, gave expression to the exuberant joy and merriment by parading about, dressed up, and singing jovial songs in honour of Dionysus. These songs were frequently interspersed with extemporised jokes at the expense of the bystanders. Comedy first assumed a regular shape amongst the Athenians. The first attempts at it amongst the Athenians were made by Sussarion, a native of Megara, about B.C. 578. Epicarchus first gave comedy a new form and introduced a regular plot. That branch of the Attic drama known as the Old Comedy begins properly with Cratinus. It lasted from B.C. 458 to B.C. 404. The later pieces of Aristophanes belong to Middle Comedy. The chorus in a comedy consisted of twenty-four. [CHORUS.] Middle Comedy lasted from B.C. 404 to B.C. 340, and the New Comedy till B.C. 290. Middle Comedy found its materials in satirising classes of people instead of individuals. New Comedy answers to the comedy

Austrian officer, who discovered it at Prague on the 27th or 28th February, 1826.] A comet which has a periodic time of about 64 years or 138 weeks. It returned in September, 1832, again in 1839, then in 1845; when, between September 19, 1845, and January 13, 1846, it separated into two comets, which went off in company, coming back together in 1852, since which time they have returned no more. But it has been discovered that when, towards the end of November, the earth intersects the lost double comet's path, there is a display of meteors. This was notably seen on Nov. 30, 1867, and on Nov. 27, 1872. Biela's is called also Gambart's Comet.

(2) Donati's Comet: [Named after Dr Donati of Florence.] A comet discovered by Donati on 2nd June, 1858. Periodic time about 2,000 years.

(3) Encke's Comet: [Named after Johann Franz Encke, Director of the Observatory at Berlin.] A comet, the periodicity of which was detected by Encke in 1819. He proved it identical with Mechain and Messier's comet of 1786, with Herschel's of 1795, and Pons's of 1805. It appeared again in 1822, 1828, and at such intervals as to show that its periodic time is 3-29 years, or 1,210 days. A recent appearance was on August 20, 1881. Its orbit is everywhere nearer the sun than that of Jupiter.

(4) Halley's Comet: [Named after the celebrated Edmund Halley, the friend of Newton, and, from 1720 to 1741-2, Astronomer-royal.] A comet, the first whose periodic time was ascertained. It is about 75 years. It was identical with the comets of 1456, 1531, and 1607, and appeared again in 1759 and 1835. It is next due in 1910. It is sometimes called Apian's Comet.

"Four shall quickly draw out my commaund."—Shaksp.: Coriol., l. 6.

¶ Word of Command:

Mil.: The word or words in which any order is expressed.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between command, precept, injunction, and order: "A command is imperative; it is the strongest exercise of authority: order is instructive; it is an expression of the wishes: an injunction is decisive; it is a greater exercise of authority than order, and less than command: a precept is a moral law; it is binding on the conscience. The three former of these are personal in their application; the latter is general: a command, an order, and an injunction, must be addressed to some particular individual; a precept is addressed to all. Command and order exclusively flow from the will of the speaker in the ordinary concerns of life; injunction has more regard to the conduct of the person addressed; precept is altogether founded on the moral obligations of men to each other. A command is just or unjust; an order is prudent or imprudent; an injunction is mild or severe; a precept is general or particular. Command and order are affirmative; injunction or precept are either affirmative or negative: the command and the order oblige us to do a thing; the injunction and precept oblige us to do it, or leave it undone."—Crabb: Eng. Synon.

5. Orders of Knighthood, &c.: A dignitary of an order, in whom was vested the administration of a commandery (q.v.).

commander-in-chief, s. The supreme commander of the united forces of any country. In the United States the President is Commander-in-Chief. In England the Commander-in-Chief is the head of a department of the military administration. He has private and military secretaries, whilst in continual communication with him to carry out his instructions are the adjutant-general and his subordinates, the quartermaster-general also with his, and other officers. He acts, under the Secretary of State for War, as the head of the army, and when military operations are undertaken on a sufficiently large scale to require his presence, is charged with the duty of commanding the army in the field, though, as a matter of fact, this very rarely occurs.

cōm-mānd'ēr-shīp, s. [Eng. commander; -ship.] The rank, position, or office of a commander. (Ecl. Rev.)

cōm-mānd'ēr-y, cōm-mānd'r-y, s. [Fr. commanderie, from Low Lat. commanderia.]

- * I. Ordinary Language:
  1. Command, authority.
  2. The office, rank, or dignity of a commander.
  3. A district under the administration of a governor or commander.

"The country is divided into four commanderies under so many governors."—Brougham.

II. Technically:

- 1. Orders of Knighthood:
  - (1) Amongst the Knights Templars, Hospitallers, &c., a district under the administration and control of a member of the order, called the commander or preceptor, who received the income of the estates within that district, expending part for his own use, and accounting for the rest. In England more especially applied to a manor belonging to the Knights Hospitallers or Knights of St. John of Jerusalem.

"These establishments formed at the same time branches . . . On the first erection of these [branch] establishments, they were denominated Preceptors; the superior being called the preceptor; but eventually the name became changed to that of commander, by which they were always afterwards known. The council reserved to themselves the power of at any time recalling a commander from his post, and substituting another in his place, at their pleasure; he being merely considered as the steward of their property. Time, however, gradually wrought a great change in the relative position which the commanders held to the council; and, eventually, a nomination to a commandery came to be considered in the light of a legal acquisition, subject only to the payment of a certain amount of annual tribute to the public treasury, which tribute received the name of Responsion."—Major Porter: Hist. Knights of Malta, vol. 1, ch. ii.

(2) A house, technically called a cell, for collecting the demesne rents of a commandery, and serving also as a home for veteran members of the order. (Ogilvie.)

2. Relig. Orders: As those of St. Bernard and St. Anthony. A district under the authority of a dignitary called a commander. (Ogilvie.)

C. As subst.: A command, an order.

"Upon his commanding Min berte is well the more glad."—Gower, l. 3.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between commanding, imperative, imperious, and authoritative: "Commanding is either good or bad according to circumstances; a commanding voice is necessary for one who has to command; but a commanding sir is offensive when it is affected: imperative is applied to things, and used in an indifferent sense: imperious is used for persons or things in the bad sense: any direction is imperative which comes in the shape of a command, and circumstances are likewise imperative, which act with the force of a command; persons are imperious who exercise their power oppressively; in this manner underlings in offices are imperious; necessity is imperious when it leaves us no choice in our conduct. Authoritative is mostly applied to persons or things, personal in the good sense only; magistrates are called upon to assume an authoritative air when they meet with any resistance." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

commanding-ground, s. Mil.: A rising ground which overlooks any post or strong place. There are three sorts of it: a Front Commanding-ground which faces the place, a Reverse Commanding-ground which takes it in the rear, and an Enfilade Commanding-ground which enables all the line of it to be swept by shot. (James.)

1. Gen.: One who writes comments or a commentary; an annotator, an expounder.

"No commentator can more silyly pass Over a learn'd, uninteresting place."—Pope: Satires, vii. 101.

2. Spec.: An expositor of Scripture or any portion of it.

¶ Every preacher is to a certain extent a commentator; thus, St. Peter, in his address on the day of Pentecost, commented on Psalm xvi. 10 (see Acts ii. 27, &c.), and St. Paul, in the synagogue at Antioch, in Pisidia, did so on Psalms ii. 7, xvi. 10, and Hab. i. 5 (see Acts xiii. 33-41). But the first commentator, more specifically so called, seems to have been Pantænus, the master of the Alexandrian School in the second century. Others who attempted to explain either the whole or part of the Scripture were Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, in the second century; Origen, Hippolytus, Victorinus, Methodius, in the third; Jerome, Hilary, Eusebius, Diodorus of Tarsus, Rufinus, Ephrem Syrus, Theodore of Heraclea, Chrysostom, Athanasius, and Didymus, in the fourth. Every subsequent century had its commentators; it would be difficult, and require too much space to attempt to enumerate those of the present one. Matthew Henry's "Exposition of the Old and New Testaments," of which the portion from Genesis to the end of Acts had been completed when the author died, on June 22nd, 1714, the rest having been added by other writers, is practical rather than critical; from its high spiritual tone it has gained a place, which no other commentary has, in the affections of pious people throughout the land. Since that time the critical study of the Scriptures has greatly advanced, and numerous distinguished commentators have arisen, both in this and in other countries.

cōm-mēnt'-ā-tōr'-ī-āl, a. [Eng. commentator; -ial.] Of or pertaining to the composition of commentaries; suitable or fit for a commentator.

côm-mêrçe, s. [Fr. commerce; Ital. & Port. commercio; Sp. comercio, from Lat. commercium: com = con, and merx (genit. mercis) = merchandise; mercor = to trade.]

A. Ordinary Language: I. Lit.: Trade, traffic; the exchange of articles for each other or for money. [E. I.]

"Where has commerce such a mart, So rich, so thronged, so drained, and so supplied, As London?" — Cooper: Task, l. 719.

II. Figuratively:

1. Social intercourse or dealings.

"... his commerce with the world had been small." — Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 1.

2. Sexual or carnal intercourse.

B. Technically:

1. Commerce:

(1) Definition: When the word is used with an extended meaning, it signifies mutual exchange, buying and selling whether abroad or at home; but in a more specific or limited sense it denotes intercourse or transactions of the character now described with foreign nations or with the colonies; mutual exchange or buying and selling at home being designated not commerce but trade.

(2) Hist.: The Phenicians, whose primitive seat was at Sidon and their next at Tyre, were the great commercial nation of the old world. Tyre was called "the crowning city whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth." (Isa. xliii, 8.) How varied were the articles in which they traded, a chapter of Ezekiel, of peculiar historic value, tells (Ezek. xxvii). It was written about 588 a.c. The Greeks with all their intellect, and the Romans with their unparalleled opportunities, did not show remarkable aptitude for commerce, nor was their success high.

In the middle ages, the Venetians, the Pisana, the Genese, the Hanse or Hanseatic towns and Flanders, either successively or in some cases two or more together, took the lead in commerce. The great impulse communicated by the discovery of America brought first the Spaniards and Portuguese, then the Dutch, and finally the British upon the scene. Even before this time London had become a large emporium of trade. William Fitz Stephens, speaking of the traffic in the reign of Henry II., says:—

"Arabian gold, Babe's spice and lincense; Scythia's keeo weapons, and the oil of palm From Babylon's deep soil; Nile's precious gains, China's bright shining silks, and Gallic wines, Norway's warm peltry, and the Russian robes, All here abound..."

The tranquil and economic reign of Queen Elizabeth gave an impulse to commerce, and before the 16th century had closed, the English engrossed, by an exclusive privilege, the commerce of Russia; they explored the sea of Spitzbergen for a passage to the markets of the East; they took an active part in the trade of the Mediterranean, and they excited the jealousy of the Hanse Towns by their operations in Germany and the continent of Europe. Other cities than London were now engaging in foreign trade, the merchants of Bristol doing so with the Canary Islands, and those of Plymouth with the coasts of Guinea and Brazil. Our traffic with India created the Anglo-Indian empire, and it again favourably reacted on the commerce which had given it birth.

(3) Modern Commerce: In the United States an enormous commerce has developed, conducted largely through the port of New York, and to a considerable extent through those of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and others. It is made up in somewhat similar proportions of articles exported and imported. Prof. Leone Levi, in his "History of British Commerce," expresses the view that the foundations of modern British Commerce were laid deeply and successfully between the end of the seven years' war (1763) and the depth of the French Revolution (1792). The mechanical skill of Lewis Paul, Lawrence Earnshaw, Hargreaves, Arkwright, and Crompton, improved the cotton machinery and gave the manufacturing supremacy to Britain. This giving an article to sell abroad, enabled much that was useful to be imported. A similar development took place with the woollen industry [WOOLLEN], and the iron manufacture [IRON MANUFACTURE].

(4) Law: Anciently in a stricter and even yet in a looser sense, the King is arbiter of commerce. Theoretically he has the power to establish public markets and fairs, with the tolls thereunto belonging, to regulate weights and measures, and to give currency to particular designations of coins. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. 1, ch. 7.)

¶ Chamber of Commerce: A society of merchants and others meeting at intervals to discuss matters connected with commerce. The first is said to have arisen at Marseilles in the 14th century. One was established in Glasgow in 1783, one in Edinburgh in 1785, and one in Manchester in 1820.

2. Games: The name of a game at cards.

• côm-mêrçe (sometimes, in poetry (?), with accent on second syllable), v.i. [COMMERCE, s.]

1. Lit.: To trade; to engage in traffic with others.

2. Fig.: To have social intercourse; to mix socially with.

"From all men, and commercing with himself, He lost the sense that handles daily life." — Tennyson: Walking to the Mall.

• côm-mêrçe-léss, a. [Eng. commerce; -less.] Without or destitute of commerce.

† côm-mêr-çer, s. [Eng. commerce(-er); -er. One who traffics or holds intercourse with another. (Nuttall.)

côm-mêr-cial (cial as shal), a. & s. [Fr. commercial, from Lat. commercium.]

1. Pertaining to, or connected with, commerce; relating to trade or traffic.

"The old tie, they said, had been parental: The new tie was purely commercial." — Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

2. Carrying on commerce or trade; engaged in traffic.

3. Used in or for commerce.

"Where Humber pours his rich commercial stream." — Cooper: A Tale Founded on a Fact.

commercial law. Law: Lex Mercatoria: The law regulating commercial transactions between the merchants belonging to different countries or merchants generally. It is derived from the custom of merchants, from international law, from the different maritime codes of ancient Europe, and from the imperial code of Rome. In Britain its first great exponent was Lord Mansfield. A modern work of high authority is Prof. Leone Levi's "Commercial Law," published 1850—52.

commercial traveller. An agent employed by wholesale firms to travel about the country soliciting orders.

commercial treaties. Treaties made between two nations for the promotion of commerce between them. The first treaty of commerce into which England is known to have entered was one with the Flemings in 1272; another followed with Portugal and Spain in 1308. The celebrated commercial treaty with France, which was negotiated between Mr. Richard Cobden, the great Free-trader, representing England, and Napoleon III., as autocrat of France, was signed on January 23rd, 1860; it produced great advantages to both countries. Numerous commercial treaties have been made between the United States and countries having commercial relations with this land. Of these the most interesting are the treaties made under the Reciprocity clause of the McKinley Act, with the republics of Central and South America, some of the West India Islands, and some countries of Europe. Under these treaties free trade in certain articles was established between the countries concerned, the free imports to the United States being confined to coffee, sugar, and hides.

côm-mêr-cial-îsm (cial as shal), s. [Eng. commercial; -ism.] A trading spirit (with a depreciatory meaning).

Commission of rebellion (otherwise called a Writ of rebellion) issues when a man (after proclamation issued out of the Chaucery or Exchequer, and made by the sheriff, to present himself under pain of his allegiance to the court by a certain day) appears not. And this commission is directed by way of command to certain persons, three, two or one of them, to apprehend, or cause to be apprehended, the party as a rebel, or contemner of the king's laws, wheresoever they find him within the kingdom, and bring, or cause him to be brought, to the court upon a day therein assigned. (Blount.)

To put a ship in commission:

Navy: To give a warrant or commission to an officer to take a ship out for active service.

commission-agent, s. The same as COMMISSION-MERCHANT (q.v.).

âte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hër, thère; pine, pît, sire, sir, marine; gô, pôb, or, wöre, wölf, wörk, whô, sôn; müte, öüb, öüre, unte, cür, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ô; ey = ä. qu = kw.

commission-day, s. The opening day of the Assizes. (Warton.)

commission-merchant, s. One who acts as agent or factor for others, receiving a certain agreed rate per cent. as his commission or reward.

*côm-mî-ssion (ssion as shôn) (2), s. [A corrupt, of chemise, or camise (q.v.).] A cant name for a shirt.

"As from our beds we doe oft cast our eyes,
Cleanse linen yields a shirt before we rise
Which is a garment shifting in condition
And in the canting tongue is a commission.
In weale or woe, in joy or dangerous drifts,
A shirt will put a man onto his shifts."
Dryden: Works, 1680.

côm-mî-ssion (ssion as shôn), v.t. [COMMISSION (1), s.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To authorize or empower; to charge or entrust with the execution of any duty or act.

"I am now commissioned to tell you, that Mr. Craggs will expect you . . ."—Pope: Letter to Fenton.

* 2. To send out or depute on any duty with a commission or charge.

" . . . a chosen band.
He first commissions to the Latian land."
Dryden: Æneid.

3. To engage or hire for a certain purpose or object.

"No goddess she commission'd to the field,
Like Pollux dreadful with her sable shield."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. v., l. 409-10.

II. Technically:

1. Mil.: To confer the rank of an officer by means of a commission.

2. Navy: To issue a commission for a ship; to send out for active service.

" . . . the Diamond, which is to be commissioned shortly for service . . ."—Daily Telegraph, Oct. 1, 1881.

† Crabb thus discriminates between to commission, to authorize, and to empower: "Commissioning passes mostly between equals: the performance of commissions is an act of civility; authorizing and empowering are as often directed to inferiors, they are frequently acts of justice and necessity. Friends give each other commissions; servants and subordinate persons are sometimes authorized to act in the name of their employers; magistrates empower the officers of justice to apprehend individuals or enter houses. We are commissioned by persons only; we are authorized sometimes by circumstances; we are empowered by law." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côm-mî-ssion-aire (ssion as shôn), s. [Fr.] A messenger, belonging to a body or corps enrolled in London, whose business is to carry messages or execute commissions.

† The Society of Commissionaires was founded in February, 1859, by Captain Edward Walter, and consisted originally of soldiers wounded in the Crimean war or in the Indian mutinies. (Haydn, &c.)

†côm-mis-su-ral, a. [Eng. commissur(e); -al.] Of or pertaining to a commissure; connecting together; belonging to a line or part by which other parts are connected together.

"The commissural fibres of the optic tracts."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. viii., p. 219.

côm-mis-sure, s. [Lat. commissura = a joining together, a band, a knot, a joint, or seam, from committô.] [COMMIT.]

1. Anat.: The point of junction of two sides of anything separated, or of two similar organs meeting at that part. Thus

CORPUS CALLOSUM, OR GREAT COMMISSURE OF BRAIN.

there are commissures at each end of the eyelids uniting them, and one at each side of the mouth connecting the lips. The commissures of the body, which are most frequently mentioned by distinctive appellations, may be arranged in three categories:—

(1) Commissures of the brain:—

"Certain systems of fibres exist in the cerebrum, which seem very evidently to unite portions of the same, or of opposite hemispheres. The most obvious of these commissures are the corpus callosum, the anterior commissure, the posterior commissure, the soft commissure, the superior longitudinal commissure, and the fornix. All, except the two last, are transverse, and unite parts of the hemispheres of opposite sides."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. x., p. 284.

(a) Anterior commissure, anterior cerebral commissure, or white commissure:

Anat.: A round bundle of white fibres placed immediately in front of the anterior pillars of the fornix, and crossing between the corpora striata of the cerebrum. It marks the anterior boundary of the ventricle.

"The anterior commissure is a remarkable bundle of transverse fibres which passes from one hemisphere to the other."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. x., p. 285.

(b) Great commissure:

Anat.: A large commissure connecting the centres of the two hemispheres of the cerebrum. It is called also the corpus callosum. (Quain.)

(c) Great transverse commissure of the cerebellum: For def. see extract.

"The fibres of the pons are always developed in the direct ratio of the hemispheres of the cerebellum . . . Hence these fibres must be regarded as especially belonging to the cerebellum, and as serving, whatever other office they may perform, to connect the hemispheres of opposite sides. They constitute, therefore, the great transverse commissure of the cerebellum, and are to the hemispheres of that organ what the corpus callosum is to those of the brain."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. x., p. 274.

(d) Grey or Gray Commissure: The same as Middle commissure (q.v.).

"The gray commissure."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. x., p. 256.

(e) Middle or soft commissure: A soft pale-grey layer or bridge, consisting of vesicular matter with nerve tubes which stretch from one optic thalamus to the other, dividing the third ventricle into a superior and an inferior portion. As it comprises vesicular matter, it is not a commissure in the same sense as the others which contain none. (Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, pp. 278, 285, 286.)

(f) Posterior commissure: A cord of transverse fibres situated beneath the base of the pineal body, and mostly connected with the posterior extremity of each thalamus. (Ibid., p. 278.)

"The posterior commissure crosses the posterior extremity of the third ventricle, and passes transversely between the optic thalami."—Todd and Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, p. 285.

(g) Soft commissure: The same as Middle commissure (q.v.).

(h) Superior longitudinal commissure: Anat.: A commissure enclosed in the internal convolution overhanging the corpus callosum. (Ibid., p. 286.)

(i) White commissure: [See No. 1.] " . . . its floor is formed by the white commissure, which has a cribriform appearance, from being perforated by numerous blood-vessels."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. x., p. 206.

(2) Commissures of the spinal cord:

(a) Anterior white commissure of the spinal cord:

Anat.: A transverse portion of white substance connecting the opposite sides of the anterior median fissure of the spinal cord.

(b) Posterior grey commissure of the spinal cord:

Anat.: A transverse portion of grey matter connecting the opposite sides of the posterior median fissure in the spinal cord.

(3) Optic commissure:

Anat.: A place, called the chiasma, where the optic nerves of two opposite sides meet each other and partially decussate. The optic commissure is constituted by the nuclei of the two optic tracts in front of the tuber cinereum.

2. Zool.: In anæsa analogous to the anatomical one.

3. Bot.: The cohering faces of two carpels, as in the Umbelliferae.

4. Masonry: The joint between two courses.

"The lord chancellor usually commits the care of his person to some friend, who is then called his committee..." The heir is generally made the manager or committee of the estate."—Sir W. Blackstone.

¶ In this sense the accent is on the last syllable.

(2) A Committee of the whole House:

Parl.: A term used when a legislative body resolves itself into a committee to consider any bill or matter, in which case the speaker leaves the chair, which is taken by one of the members, called the Chairman of Committee. While in Committee a member is allowed to speak more than once on any point.

(3) The Committee of Council:

Law: An abbreviation of Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

(4) The Committee of Public Safety: [A rendering of the French term, Comité de Salut public.]

Hist.: The name given to a committee of members of the French National Convention during the first revolution. When the National Convention, about the end of 1792, abolished monarchy and proclaimed a republic, it divided the executive government among several committees, paramount over which was the Committee of Public Safety, appointed on 6th April, 1793. When the Girondists were overthrown by the Revolution of 31st May, 1793, and the Jacobins, or the party of the Mountain, gained supreme power, the powers of the Committee of Public Safety were enlarged. It was the rule of this tyrannical and sanguinary committee which is known as the Reign of Terror. Robespierre was its animating spirit, next to whom stood Couthon and St. Just. The execution of these three men on the 10th Thermidor (July 28th, 1794) was a lesson to the more extreme party in the committee, which did not again perpetrate the same excesses as before, and it is considered as having terminated the Reign of Terror. In March, 1871, the Communists established a similar committee in Paris, which fell in May of the same year. [COMMUNE.]

com-mō-dī-ōus, a. [Low Lat. commodiosus; Lat. commodus: com = con; modus = a measure, a mode.]

1. Suitable, fit, advantageous, useful; suited to its purpose.

"There in commodious shelter may we rest." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. III.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between commodious and convenient: "Both these terms convey the idea of what is calculated for the pleasure of a person. Commodious regards the physical condition, and convenience the mental feelings. That is commodious which suits one's bodily ease; that is convenient which suits one's purpose. A house, a chair, is commodious; a time, an opportunity, a season, or the arrival of any person, is convenient. A noise incommodes; the staying or going of a person may be inconvenient. A person wishes to sit commodiously, and to be conveniently situated for witnessing any spectacle." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

com-mō-dī-ōus-ly, adv. [Eng. commodious; -ly.]

1. In a commodious manner, conveniently, comfortably.

"We need not fear To pass commodiously this life." Milton: P. L., x. L. 1088.

2. Classic Prosody: That may be short or long at will.

3. Logic: Applied to terms or names, in opposition to individual, singular, or proper. Common-terms, therefore, are called 'predicables,' (viz. affirmatively-predicable,) from their capability of being affirmed of others: a singular-term, on the contrary, may be the subject of a proposition, but never the predicate, unless it be of a negative proposition; (as, e.g., the first-born of Isaac was not Jacob); or, unless the subject and predicate be only two expressions for the same individual object, as in some of the above instances."

4. Anat.: In the same sense as A. 1.

¶ Nerves of common sensation: For def. see extract.

"The distinction which has been made between nerves of common and of special sensation, is indicated by the fact, that while a stimulus to the former causes pain, that to the latter gives rise to a peculiar or special sensation, as of light, sound, or taste..."

4. Music: [COMMON-CHORD, COMMON-TIME.]

B. As adv.: Commonly, more than common = more than is common.

"I am more than common tall..."

C. As substantive:
I. Ordinary Language:

† I. The generality, what is usual or common.

"Your son will... exceed the common..."

* 2. The community at large, the commons (q.v.). [COMMUNE, s.]

"Now for to speak of the commons..."

3. An open and (generally) unenclosed space, the use of which is not restricted to any individual, but is free to the public, or to a certain number, as, "The Commons," in Boston. Park is a similar public space.

than if it were divided among different individuals. As population, therefore, increased, inclosures became necessary if the people were to be properly fed. Laws made for its purpose were favourable to the lord of the manor. By the statute of Merton and other subsequent enactments (20 Hen. III. c. 4, 29 Geo. II. c. 36, and 81 Geo. II. c. 41) the might inclose as much of the waste as he pleased for tillage or for wood ground provided he left common sufficient for such as were entitled thereto. A multitude of other Inclosure Acts followed, commencing with 41 Geo. III. c. 109, and running down to 31 and 32 Vict. c. 39. Under these, in 1845, Commissioners, called Inclosure Commissioners, were appointed. [INCLOSURES.] It was calculated in 1685 that of 87,000,000 acres of land existing in England, about 18,000,000, or nearly the half, were moorland, forest, and fen. Up till 1845 about 10,000,000 more acres were inclosed, bringing the total aggregate to 28,000,000; more than 1,000,000 have since been dealt with in a similar way.

But within recent years a reaction against inclosure has set in among the inhabitants of the great cities and towns, to whom open spaces within accessible distance are essential for health and recreation. Nowhere has this necessarily been more felt than in London, and in 1866 an Act was passed for the improvement, protection, and management of the commons near the metropolis, while in 1878, the Metropolitan Board of Works were authorised to secure commons where opportunity offered near the metropolis. The great wooded common, known as Epping Forest, gained from the lords of the manors and others by a decision of the Master of the Rolls on 10th Nov., 1874, was transferred to the Corporation of the City of London, who had been the successful litigants, and after an arbitrator had settled all claims, Queen Victoria dedicated it on the 6th May, 1882, to the use of the people for ever.

"Houslow Heath, on the great Western Road, and Finchley Common, on the great Northern Road, were perhaps the most celebrated of these spots..."

II. Law: The right of enjoying any privilege in common with others; a community of interest or right. This may be of many kinds, as, common of custom = the right to take wood for fuel or repairs; common of estovers = the right of taking wood for fuel or for domestic purposes; common of pasture = the right of turning out a certain number of cattle to pasture on certain common lands: it is usually of three kinds—appendant (when the right is supposed to have belonged to the house from time immemorial, because the house was within the manor), appurtenant (when the right has become annexed to the house either by gift or purchase, or in some other way), and in gross (when the right belongs to a person to turn out on the common, and does not belong to any house or land); common of piscary = a right of fishing in waters belonging to another; and common of turbary = the right of digging turf on the lands of another.

¶ Free common over the vicinage is when the wastes of the manor join, and there is no fence between them, the beasts of the common of one manor being allowed to stray on the wastes of the other manor.

D. In special phrases:

1. Above the common: Superior to the generality, better than usual.

2. Brethren of the Common Lot: Ch. Hist.: One of the names given to the Brethren of Social Life, a sect which arose in the 14th century. [SOCIAL.]

4. Disturbance of common: [DISTURBANCE.]

5. In common:
(1) Ordinary Language:

(a) To be enjoyed or participated in equally with another or others.

"... children or servants could not eat the meat which their father or master had provided for them in common..."

(b) Affecting or characterizing equally, or to an equal degree.

"... they had nothing but their Whiggism in common..."

(c) Equally, commonly, indiscriminately. "Love alle cristene creatures In commune, ech man other."

bōil, hōy; pēt, jōwl; cat, çoll, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xonophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, sious, -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

(d) Followed by the prep. with before the person or thing equally affected.

"... having that in common with dictionaries, ..." —Archibald: Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

(2) Law:

(a) Holding or participating in any right equally with others.

"Tenants in common are such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession." —Blackstone.

(b) Held in common with others.

"Estates may be held in four different ways: in severalty, in joint tenancy, in coparcenary, and in common." —Blackstone.

* 6. In the common of: In debt or under an obligation to.

7. Out of the common: Extraordinary, uncommon, unusual. (Generally used in a commendatory sense.)

8. Tenants in common:

Law: Tenants who hold by several and distinct titles but by unity of possession.

9. To make common cause with: To join or league oneself with; to make the cause of another one's own.

10. To quiet a common or common: To requite, to settle accounts with one, to repay. (Generally in a bad sense.) (Scotch.)

¶ A thing is said to be good one's common when one is under great obligations to do it; to be ill one's common, when one, from the peculiar obligations he lies under, ought to set a very different part. (Scotch.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between common, ordinary, mean, and vulgar: "Familiar use renders things common, vulgar, and ordinary; but what is mean is so of itself: the common, vulgar, and ordinary, are therefore frequently, though not always, mean; and on the contrary what is mean is not always common, vulgar, or ordinary; consequently, in the primitive sense of these words, the first three are not strictly synonymous with the last: monsters are common in Africa; vulgar reports are little to be relied on. . . . Common is opposed to rare and refined: vulgar to polite and cultivated; ordinary to the distinguished: mean to the noble; a common mind busies itself with common objects; vulgar habits are easily contracted from a slight intercourse with vulgar people; an ordinary person is seldom associated with elevation of character; and a mean appearance is a certain mark of a degraded condition, if not of a degraded mind." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) common assurances.

Law: The legal evidences assuring one that his property has been transferred to him. This may be done by deed, by record, by special custom, or by devise through means of a will, not operative till after the testator's death.

¶ Court of Common Bench: The same as the Court of Common Pleas. It was so called because the suits of common people were there tried.

common centring, s.

Building: Such as is constructed without trusses, but having a tie-beam at its ends. Also that employed in straight vaults.

common-chord, s.

Music: A note accompanied by its major or minor 3rd and perfect 5th. [HARMONY.] In thorough bass, the figure 3, a sharp, flat or natural, as the case may be, or the absence of any letter, character, or figure, denotes the common chord of the bass notes. When there is more than one chord on the same bass note, the common chord is figured  $\frac{1}{2}$ . (Stainer & Barrett.) common-council, s.

1. The governing body of a city, corporate town or borough, empowered to make rules and regulations for the due administration of municipal affairs.

In this country, its composition is variable. Thus the name may be applied to the single body (as a board of aldermen), or to the aggregate bodies in which this power is vested, or again to the lower branch of the legislative body; as in Philadelphia, where the title is restricted to the second of the two city councils, the first being termed the Select Council (q.v.).

2. A meeting of such governing body.

common-councillman, s. A member of the common-council of a city or corporate town.

common-count, s. [COUNT.]

common-crier, s. A public or town crier.

common-law, s. The unwritten law, consisting of those customs and usages which have, by long prescription and immemorial usage, obtained the binding force of law. It is distinguished from statute-law (q.v.), which derives its authority from acts of Parliament.

common-lawyer, s. One skilled in or practicing common-law.

"Canonists, civilians, and common-lawyers do all admit this distinction." —Spenner.

Arith.: The measure of two numbers. Thus 2 is a measure of 6 and 24, that is, it can divide each of them without a remainder, thus— $\frac{6}{2} = 3, \frac{24}{2} = 12.$

¶ Greatest common measure: The largest number which will divide two others without leaving a remainder. Thus 4 is the greatest common measure of 12 and 16, for  $\frac{12}{4} = 3, \frac{16}{4} = 4.$  If any greater number than 4 be used as the divisor there will be a remainder, thus  $\frac{12}{6} = 2, \text{ but } \frac{16}{6} = 2 \frac{4}{6}.$

common multiple, a. [MULTIPLE.]

common nuisance.

Law: [NUISANCE.]

common people, s. pl. The artisans and labourers, the manual labourers.

"King in his Natural and Political Conclusions roughly estimated the common people of England at 80,000 families. Of these families 40,000, according to him, ate animal food twice a week. The remaining 40,000 ate it not at all, or at most not often than once a week." —Maccaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

And yet with something of a grace."
Wordsworth: To the Daisy.

common-placed, pa. par. or a. [COMMONPLACE, v.]

Common-Pleas, s. The king's court long held in Westminster Hall, but anciently movable. Gwin observes that until after the granting of the Magna Charta, there were but two courts, the Exchequer and the King's Bench, so called because it followed the King; but, upon the grant of that charter, the Court of Common Pleas was erected and settled at Westminster. All civil causes, both real and personal, were formerly tried in this court, according to the strict laws of the realm; and Fortescue represents it as the only court for real causes. Courts of Common Pleas exist in the several states of the American Union, their jurisdiction being confined to civil cases, in distinction to the courts of criminal jurisdiction.

Common-Prayer, s.

common salt, s.

Chem.: Chloride of sodium (q.v.). See also SALT.

common seal, s. A seal used by a corporation as a symbol of their being incorporated.

common-sense, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Originally signified a common internal sense, and what may be perhaps termed a collective sense, formed by the union of the five special ones, which were supposed to meet at some point in the body, as the radii of a circle converge to and unite in its centre.

"That there is some particular or restrained seat of the common sense is an opinion that even old philosophers and physicians are agreed upon. And it is an ordinary comparison amongst them that the external senses and the common sense, considered together, are like a circle with five lines drawn from the circumference to the centre. Wherefore, as it has been obvious to them to find out particular organs for the external senses, so they have also attempted to assign some distinct part of the body to be an organ of the common sense: that is to say, as they discovered sight to be seated in the eye, hearing in the ear, smelling in the nose, &c., so they conceived that there is some part of the body wherein seeing, hearing and all other perceptions meet together, as the lines of a circle in the centre; and that there the soul does also judge and discern of the difference of the objects of the outward senses." —Henry More: Immortality of the Soul, vol. iii., ch. 13. (Trench.)

2. The modicum of sense or understanding possessed by people in general; the power supposed to be possessed by people in general of deciding simple questions accurately; the common judgment of mankind.

fāte, fāt, fāre, āmidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camōl, hēr, thōre; pine, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn: mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

"His aim was mischief, and his zeal pretence, His speech rebellion against common sense."

Cooper: Hope.

II. Mental phil.: When Berkeley, carrying out the system of idealism, had shown that on the principle which is laid down, the existence of the material world could not be proved, and Hume carried Berkeley's scepticism to a yet greater length, the Rev. Dr. Neil, Prof. of Mental Philosophy in King's College, Aberdeen, built up a system designed to be antagonistic to this sceptical one, in what he called common-sense. The first principles of belief which all ordinary men, not idiots or lunatics, accept undoubtedly, were assumed to be axiomatic, and became the foundation of a system of mental philosophy. Dugald Stewart, holding essentially the same views as Reid, thought the term common-sense an unhappy one, and substituted for it "the fundamental laws of human belief."

B. As adjective:

Of a view, &c.: Such a one as an ordinary person of sound judgment would take.

common-sergeant, s. A judicial officer appointed by the Corporation of London as an assistant to the Recorder.

common sewer, s. A sewer through which the whole sewage of a city, town, or village passes.

common-time, s.

Music: Time with two beats in a bar or any multiple of two beats in a bar. The beats may be of the value of any note or rest or compound of notes and rests, providing the sum required by the time sign be exactly contained in each bar. Common time is of two kinds, simple and compound. Simple common time is that which includes four beats in a bar, or any division of that number, or square of the number or its divisions. The signs used to express simple common time are the following:

2, 3, 4, 4, 4, and the characters C and C. In these signs the upper figure denotes the quantity of notes required in the bar, and the lower figure the quality of the notes. Compound common-time is expressed by the signs 3, 4, 6, 8, 9, each sign meaning two or four beats of three crochets or quavers to each beat. [TIME.] (Stainer and Barrett.)

common vouchee, s.

Law: [VOUCHEE.]

3. Generally, frequently, usually, widely, freely.

"That man, it was commonly said, has never wanted, and never will want, an expedient."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

4. Poorly, meanly.

† Crabb thus discriminates between commonly, frequently, usually, and generally:

"What is commonly done is an action common to all; what is generally done is the action of the greatest part; what is frequently done is either the action of many, or an action many times repeated by the same person; what is usually done is done regularly by one or many. Commonly is opposed to rarely; generally and frequently to occasionally or seldom; usually to casually; men commonly judge of others by themselves; those who judge by the mere exterior are generally deceived; but notwithstanding every precaution, one is frequently exposed to gross frauds; a man of business usually repairs to his counting-house every day at a certain hour." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

com-môn-ness, s. [Eng. common; -ness.]

com-môn-s, s. pl. [From common, adj., and s, the sign of the pl.]

* 1. The people who had a right to sit or a right to vote for representatives in the House of Commons.

"The commons consist of all such men of property in the kingdom as have not seats in the House of Lords, every one of which has a voice in parliament.

bôn, bôy; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, a; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -sious, -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

either personally or by his representative."—Blackstone's Comment., bk. I, ch. 2. (See also the example under 2.)

2. All who are under the rank of peers without reference to their voting privileges.

"The word commons in its present ordinary signification comprises all the people who are under the rank of peers, without any regard to property, but upon a future occasion I shall endeavour to prove that in its original signification it was confined to those only who had a right to sit or a right to vote for representatives in the house of commons."—Blackstone's Comment., bk. I, ch. 2, (note).

3. The House of Commons.

4. A ration or allowance of food.

¶ To be on "short commons": To be scantily provided.

¶ (1) Doctors' Commons: [DOCTORS' COMMONS.]

(2) House of Commons:

(a) Definition: That one of the two Houses of Parliament which consist of representatives duly elected according to law in prescribed numbers by the burgh, county, and university constituencies of the United Kingdom. The name Commons is given to its members to distinguish them from the peers of the United Kingdom who sit in the House of Lords.

(b) History: The earliest traces of the House of Commons are in A.D. 1265. The year previously (on May 12, 1264), Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, who was of French origin but brother-in-law to King Henry III., defeated his sovereign at the Battle of Lewes, and made him prisoner. In 1265 the victor issued writs in the King's name requiring each sheriff of a county to return to a parliament which he proposed to hold, two knights for the shire under his jurisdiction, two citizens for each city within its limits, and two burgesses for each borough. A parliament of lords and other dignitaries had existed previously; county representatives may occasionally have sat almost from the commencement of the 13th century, and an assembly of knights and burgesses, nicknamed the Mad Parliament, had met in A.D. 1258, but no writs are extant before De Montfort's, summoning the representatives of cities and boroughs to attend. The Parliament thus called together met in London on the 22nd January, 1265, but on the 4th August De Montfort was slain at the battle of Evesham, and the royal government restored. The victory was obtained for the king mainly through the military ability of Prince Edward, afterwards King Edward I., who, at least as early as 1294, i.e., the 22nd year of his reign, himself called together a parliament of the De Montfort type. The borough representatives were 246, those from the counties or shires 74. Under Edward III. these numbers had altered to 282 and 74. Each place represented sent two members, without reference to its population. There was universal suffrage; members required no property qualification, and were paid. In the eighth year of Henry VI. the county franchise was narrowed in its operation, no one now being allowed to vote unless he possessed freehold worth 40 shillings, a sum the purchasing power of which would have been about the equivalent of £12 at the beginning of the 18th century, and £20 at the commencement of the 19th. The Act 23 Hen. VI. c. 14, made it an indispensable qualification for election as a member of Parliament that the person should be a knight, or eligible to be one, by which was meant that he should have a freehold of £40 a year. James I., by his royal prerogative, conferred two members on the University of Oxford and the same number on that of Cambridge. All along till the revolution of 1688, efforts were made insistively to reduce, or, if not, then at least to damage, the burgh representation. But in 1694, the 6 and 7 William and Mary, c. 2, enacted that Parliaments in future should be triennial, an alteration which much tended to render the House of Commons independent of the royal authority. A similar Act had been passed in 1641, but repealed in 1664. The Act 9 Queen Anne, c. 5, established a landed property qualification for members, whether for counties or boroughs, and by the 1st George I., passed in 1716, the Septennial Act was established which made the legal duration of a parliament seven instead of three years. It is still in force. At the beginning of the 18th century, England and Wales had 513 members of Parliament. The union with Scotland in 1707 added 80 county and 15 borough members to the House of Commons, that with Ireland on January 1, 1801, 64 for counties, 35 for cities, and one for Dublin University. This made up the entire representation of the United Kingdom to 658, a number which has since been nominally preserved, though the suspension of writs in individual constituencies for proved flagrant bribery has occasionally slightly reduced the number. For the sweeping changes of the distribution of political power produced in 1832 and 1867 by the transference of members from small and decaying places to important and rising burghs or sections of counties, see REFORM BILLS.

(c) Present state: A parliament cannot spring into life by any effort of its own: it requires to be summoned by the Sovereign. During an interregnum a Convention Parliament, sometimes called simply a Convention, can do so, and has done it twice in English history, once in 1660, the other time in 1688. [CONVENTION.] The persons entitled to appear as members of the House of Commons and of Parliament are those who have been elected by the registered electors of the several parliamentary constituencies, and have taken an oath or made an affirmation of loyalty, &c., in the normal way.

The House of Commons is presided over by a Speaker. [SPEAKER.] The first one, called Peter De La Mere, was elected in A.D. 1377. Most of the important legislation which emanates from the Imperial Parliament has its origin in the House of Commons. For the several stages through which a bill proposing some legislative change must pass before becoming law, see BILL and ACT. For the privileges of Members of Parliament, see MEMBERS. By the Septennial Act [1.] a Parliament which has escaped what may be termed a violent end, dies a natural death in seven years. [SEPTENNIAL.] A general election of representatives to serve in the new House of Commons, then takes place [ELECTION], and when a new Parliament assembles, the House of Lords, as an essential part of the complex machinery, is also summoned to meet. But few parliaments die a natural death. When the Ministry is defeated on what they deem a vital point, and they are of opinion that the country agrees with them and not with their adversaries, the Sovereign generally receives and acts upon the advice to dissolve Parliament, an act which formally submits to the judgment of the constituencies the disputed point which caused the ministerial crisis. [DISSOLUTION.] When a parliament only adjourns, on resuming its sittings, it takes up its business where it was left off, but when prorogued the Session is held to be at an end, and most of the business has to begin anew. 2. Spec. (Of the form commonwealth):

(1) In the abstract: The republican form of government.

(2) In the concrete: The period in the history of England during which the Parliamentary army and the Protector Oliver Cromwell exercised the power of government. King Charles I. was beheaded on January 30th, 1649; but if the commencement of the Commonwealth be deferred to the time when Oliver Cromwell became Protector, then its beginning was not till December 16th, 1653. It received an all but fatal blow by the death of its great chief, September 3rd, 1658. On April 22nd, 1659, Richard Cromwell, his incompetent son and successor, resigned, and on May 29th, 1660, Charles II. was restored to the throne.

commonwealth's-man, s. One who favoured or supported the government established by Oliver Cromwell after the execution of Charles I.

1. A disturbance, a tumult; public agitation or disorder; an insurrection, rising, or rebellion.

"... that they had made commotions and divisions in the town, ..."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. I.

2. A movement or disturbance; violent agitation or excitement.

(1) Of material things:

"... that he would allay the commotions of the water, ..."—Woodward: Nat. Hist.

"We on the earth's surface live night and day in the midst of material commotion."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), l. 5.

(2) Of the mind, &c.:

"Some strange commotion Is in his brain; he bites his lips, and starts."

*côm-mô'-tion-ër, s. [Eng. commotion; -er.] One who causes or takes part in a commotion.

"A dangerous commotioner, that in so great and populous a city as London is, could draw but those same two fellows!"—Bacon: Observ. on a Libel in 1592.

côm-mûne (1), s. [COMMON, v.] Familiar intercourse, friendly conversation.

côm-mûne (2), s. [Fr. commune, from comun = the commonalty. In Prov. comuna, comunia; Ital. comuna.]

I. In France:

1. Ordinary Language:

* (1) Under the feudal regime: A body of burghesses in a town which had received a charter granting it municipal government.

(2) Subsequently:

(a) Any assemblage of villagers or others united by common interests and under the same local government; a parish, a district.

(b) The commonalty, as opposed to the nobility.

2. History:

(1) The municipality of Paris, which, during the most sanguinary period of the first French Revolution, was the mouthpiece of the more ferocious revolutionaries. Under the old regime, power had been in the hands of the privileged classes, the king, the nobles, the higher ecclesiastics and other dignitaries, and their tyranny caused the revolution. Men of genius, chiefly from the middle classes, led the uprising at its commencement, and constituted the Girondist party, which, to gain the victory over the upper class, encouraged or even fomented revolts among the masses of the Parisian populace. The policy was successful for its primary object, but the demagogic spirit they had raised they could not again lay, and ultimately it was fatal to themselves. When, in 1792, it was believed that Austria and Prussia, which had invaded France, designed to force again on the nation the emigrant aristocracy thirsting for vengeance, the Legislative Assembly enacted that whenever it passed a vote that the country was in danger, every municipality should sit permanently. All ranks should arm, and those of them called to serve out of their native place should receive pay. The vote "The country is in danger" actually having taken place, the Municipality of Paris, which met at the Hotel de Ville, and had been formally constituted there on the 21st of May, 1791, began to sit in permanence. Subordinate councils were formed in each of the districts or sections of the city. These subordinate sections sent commissaries to the leading municipality, who, in place of aiding the old members in their deliberations, simply expelled them and usurped the power which they had wielded. Thus was constituted the celebrated Commune under whose auspices the Tuileries were captured, the Legislative Assembly and the Convention themselves demoralized over, the Jacobin and other clubs of extreme politicians put in possession of all power in Paris and France, massacres of remorseless cruelty perpetrated, and the Reign of Terror inaugurated. Robespierre, Marat, and Danton became its leading spirits. Of this triumvirate Marat was assassinated on July 13, 1793, Danton guillotined on April 5, 1794; and when on July 28 Robespierre shared the same fate, having been captured the day before at the Hotel de Ville, the head-quarters of the Commune, the illegitimate domination of the latter came to an end, and Paris was soon afterwards, for safety's sake, divided into twelve municipalities instead of one.

(2) On March 18, 1871, an insurrection in Paris overthrew the Government, and an organization, taking the name and prepared to carry out the traditions of the old revolutionary commune, was proclaimed on the 28th. Among its notable, not to say notorious deeds, were the burning of the Tuileries, the Hotel de Ville, and some other public buildings of historic interest. Four days afterwards, or on May 28, 1871, Paris was taken by storm, the commune fell, and many of the communards were either executed or transported.

* II. In England: The common people, the commons.

II. Eccles.: To partake of the Holy Communion.

"... that whom the law of the realm doth punish unless they communicate..."—Hooker: Eccl. Pol., bk. v, ch. lxviii, § 7.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to communicate and to impart: "Imparting is a species of communicating; one always communicates in imparting, but not vice versa. Whatever can be enjoyed in common with others is communicated; whatever can be shared by another is imparted: what one knows or thinks is communicated, or made commonly known; what one feels is imparted and participated in: intelligence is communicated; secrets or sorrows are imparted: those who always communicate all they hear, sometimes communicate more than they really know; it is the characteristic of friendship to allow her votaries to impart their joys and sorrows to each other. A person may communicate what belongs to another, as well as that which is his own; but he imparts that only which concerns or belongs to himself: an openness of temper leads some men to communicate their intentions as soon as they are formed; loquacity impels others to communicate whatever is told them: a generosity of temper leads some men to impart their substance for the relief of their fellow creatures; a desire for sympathy leads others to impart their sentiments. There is a great pleasure in communicating good intelligence, and in imparting good advice." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côm-mûn'-î-câ-tive, a. [Fr. communicatif, from Low Lat. communicativus, from communicatus, pa. par. of communico = to share, to communicate.] Ready or disposed to communicate or share with others, willing to make things known or common; free, open, not reserved.

"... we have paid for, or want of prudence, and determine for the future to be less communicative."—Swift & Pope.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between communicative and free: "A communicative temper leads to the breach of all confidence; a free temper leads to violation of all decency; a communicativeness of disposition produces much mischief; freedom of speech and behaviour occasions much offence. Communicativeness is the excess of sincerity; it offends by revealing what it ought to conceal: freedom is the abuse of sincerity; it offends by speaking what it ought not to think." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côm-mûn'-î-câ-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. communicative; -ly.] By way of communication or community, as having a common character.

"... then must the name be collectively and communicatively taken."—Milton: Prose Works, 318.

côm-mûn'-î-câ-tive-nêss, s. [Eng. communicative; -ness.] The quality of being communicative; willingness to communicate, impart to, or share with others; openness, freeness. (Hammond.)

côm-mûn'-î-câ-tôr, s. [Lat. communicator, from communico = to share, to communicate.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who communicates or imparts, an informant.

2. Mech.: A means of communicating between two places; specially a contrivance enabling passengers in a railway carriage to communicate with the guard in cases of danger or accident.

* côm-mûn'-î-câ-tôr-ry, a. [Low Lat. communicatorius, from Lat. communicator.] Imparting or conveying knowledge or information.

"... canonical and communicatory letters,..."—Barrow: Discourse on the Unity of the Church.

côm-mûn'-îng, * com-an-yng, * com-yng, pr. par., a., & s. [COMMUNE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

"Ye hav don wel, comyng to my tribulacion."—Wycliffe: Philip, iv. 14.

C. As substantive:

* 1. The act of sharing or communicating.

† 2. The act of consulting, conversing, or talking with another.

"And the Lord went his way, as soon as he had left communing with Abraham..."—Gen. xviii. 33.

* 3. The act of receiving the Holy Communion.

"That is i-callid holly comyng, that is after penance."—Gesta Romanorum (ed. Herrtage), p. 198.

côm-mûn'-î-ôn, * com-mun-yone, s. [O. Fr. communion; Sp. comun; Ital. comunione; Lat. communia, from communis.] [COMMON, a.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. The act of communicating or sharing.

* 2. Fellowship, partnership; participation in things; community of goods.

"Not that this communion of goods seems ever to have been applicable, even in the earliest ages, to ought but the substance of the thing..."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii, ch. 1.

* 3. Converse, communing, interchange of thought.

"They eat, they drink: and in communion sweet."—Milton: P. L. v.

4. Intercourse, dealing.

"The Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopians."—Raleigh.

* 5. An act performed publicly or in common, "... they served and praised God by communion, and in publick manner."—Raleigh: Hist. of the World.

II. Technically:

1. Scrip.: The appropriate rendering of the word κοινοvia (koinōnia) in 1 Cor. x. 16. The revisers retain the word communion, but place in the margin, "participation in." It seems to have a double reference: (1) Participation in "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of [participation in] the blood of Christ: the bread which we break, is it not a communion of [participation in] the body of Christ." (2) The unity of those who participate: "... seeing that we who are many are one bread, one body, for we all partake of the one bread." In the margin: "Seeing that there is one bread, we, who are many, are one body."

2. Theology:

(1) The act of partaking with others of the sacramental symbols in the Lord's Supper. For the first three centuries the communion was administered every Lord's Day; then it became more infrequent, and before long was limited to Easter, Whitsunday, and Christmas. Many neglecting it even on these days, the Council of Lateran, in 1215, ordered all Catholics to communicate at least once a year, naming Easter as the time, an injunction which the Council of Trent confirmed. For the first seven centuries the practice was somewhat general of mixing water with the wine to symbolise the mystic union between Christ and the communicant's soul. Originally both bread and wine were administered, but in 1096, Pope Urban II, sanctioned the practice of omitting the wine when the communicant was a layman. This method the Council of Constance enjoined in 1414. It has since remained in force in the Church of Rome, but at the Reformation communion in both kinds, as it is often termed, was restored to the laity. The communion service of the Church of England was adopted in 1552.

(2) The community of belief, and theoretically at least, of Christian affection, existing among those who partake together of the Lord's Supper. Communio is used in this sense in fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôc, or, wêre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, rûle, fûll; try, Sýrian. æ, œ = é. ey = â. qu = kw.

the canons of the Council of Elvirs, A.D. 313. From this use of the Latin word is derived the practice of calling the several denominations, Communions, as the Lutheran Communion, the Wesleyan Methodist Communion, the Congregational Communion, &c.

communion service, a.

Eccles.: The service, whether liturgical or of any other kind, adopted in a church when the Holy Communion is celebrated. [COMMUNION, II. 1.]

communion table, a.

Eccles.: The table, often called in the English church the altar, used in connection with the administration of the Holy Communion.

* côm-mûn'-î-ôn-ist, s. [Eng. communion; -ist.] One who belongs to the same communion.

côm-mûn-îsm, s. [Fr. communisme.]

1. A socialistic reconstruction of the body politic on the plan of abolishing private property, and transferring everything formerly possessed by individuals to the State, which then charges itself with the task of assigning work to each of the citizens, and dividing the profits among each. Communism of a certain modified type was advocated in Britain by Robert Owen in his "New View of Society," published in 1813. He attempted, without the assistance of any government, to found a society on the new model on the banks of the Wabash, in 1825, but the attempt failed. The United States have been the seat of numerous other communistic societies, including the Separatist Community, at Zoar, Ohio; the Harmony Society, near Pittsburgh; the Duncans, at Ephrata, Pennsylvania; the Brook Farm Community, the Community of the Perfectionists, the Shakers, and others. The last named is in successful operation. St. Simon, Fourier, and Proudhon have been its leaders in France, and it seems working as a great unseen force in Germany and Russia. But no communistic society has yet been successful, though, in many cases, co-operative schemes have achieved the ends designed by their founders. [COMMUNITY, SOCIALISM.]

2. Support of the Parisian commune in its procedure at two periods of revolution. [COMMUNE (2).]

côm-mû-nîst, s. [Fr. communiste.] One who supports the theory or practice of communism. [COMMUNISM.]

"... there were among them, millenarians, communists."—Mittman: Hist. of Latin Christianity, bk. xiii, ch. xi.

côm-mû-nîs'-tîc, a. [Eng. communionist; -ic.] Pertaining to, or characteristic of, communism.

"And every one would probably assent beforehand that, if so strange a mode of legislation existed anywhere, it could issue only in enactments of a purely communistic kind."—Saturday Review, Oct. 8, 1864.

† côm-mû-nîs'-tî-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. communionist; -ly.] In accordance with the principles or teaching of communism.

côm-mûn'-î-tÿ, * côm-oun-to, * côm-une-to, s. [O. Fr. communîté; Ital. comunità; Sp. comunidad; Port. comunidade, from Lat. communitas, from communis = common.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality or state of being enjoyed in common by two or more persons or other animated beings; identity of interests or privileges; common ownership.

2. The commonwealth; the members of a body politic having equal rights and privileges, civil and political, and united by common interests.

"A strong line of demarcation must therefore be drawn between the soldiers and the rest of the community."—Vacutay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

3. The members of any society united by certain rules and regulations.

4. A number or body of any living beings associated for purposes of society or defence.

"Creatures that in communities exist." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

* 5. The commons; the common people.

"Toward the plain of Salisbury, where as the commune of the people shoulde assemble."—Merlin, iii. 574.

* 6. Frequency, commonness.

"As sick and blunted with community, Afford no extraordinary gaze." Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., III. 2.

7. Common character.

"The essential community of nature between organic growth and inorganic growth..."—Herbert Spencer: Data of Biology, § 4.

"... that community of descent is the hidden bond which naturalists have been unconsciously seeking..."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. xiii, p. 490.

II. Technically:

1. Her.: Arms of Community are those borne by cities, towns, universities, colleges, abbeys, guilds, mercantile companies, &c.

2. Socialism: Community of goods, that is, the holding all goods in common, and the abolition of individual ownership, is advocated by many who wish to reconstruct society on a socialistic basis. It is believed to have existed in the early ages of the world, and in the first part of the apostolic age of Christianity. The view requires modification in both cases. In the first, Blackstone is of opinion that what existed in the earliest ages was a transient right of private property, that is, that one who first began to use anything acquired a brief right of proprietorship in it, which lapsed when he ceased to use it any longer. At the first rise of Christianity a near approach was made to the establishment of community of goods in the church, to cast what one had into the common treasury being the rule, to which there was scarcely an exception (Acts ii. 44, 45; iv. 32). But from Acts v. 4 we learn that this rule was not enjoined upon any one; each was free to retain his property for his own use if he pleased. [CHURCH HISTORY, COMMUNISM.]

côm-mût-a-bîl'-î-tÿ, s. [Eng. commutable; -ity.] The quality or state of being commutable; interchangeability.

"When both are substantives, the commutability of terms of this kind is complete."—Dr. R. G. Latham: Logic as applied to Language.

côm-mût-a-ble, a. [Lat. commutabilis, from commutatio = to exchange; com = with; muto = to change.] Capable of being commuted, or of being exchanged for other things; interchangeable.

"But here the predicate and subject are not commutable."—Whately: Elements of Logic.

côm-mû-tâ-tion, s. [Fr. commutation, from Lat. commutatio = an exchange; commutatio = to exchange.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. A changing or altering from one state to another.

"... in a word, so great is the commutation, that the soul then hated only that which now only it loves."—South: Sermon.

* 2. Exchange; the act of giving and receiving one thing for another.

"... that there be some method and means of commutation, as that of money."—Ray: On the Creation.

* 3. A ransom.

"The law of God had allowed an evasion, that is, by way of commutation or redemption."—Brown.

4. A sum of money or other equivalent given in exchange for something else.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: The angle of commutation is the angular distance between the sun's true place from the earth, and the place of a planet reduced to the ecliptic.

2. Rhetoric: A figure of speech whereby a complete transposition of the words in the sentence takes place; as, "I do not live that I may eat, but I eat that I may live." In Gr. ἀντιμεταβολή (antimetabolē).

3. Law:

(1) The substitution of a punishment less in degree for one greater in degree.

(2) The giving one thing in exchange or equivalent for another, as the exchange of titles for a rent-charge.

† Commutation of Tithes: [TITHES.]

côm-mû-ta-tive, côm-mû-tâ-tive, a. [Fr. commutatif, as if from a Lat. commutativus, from commutatus, p. par. of commutatio.] Of or pertaining to exchange.

"Commulative justice requires that every man should have his own."—Sp. Hall: Gates of Conscience, l. 7.

† A commutative contract:

Law: One in which each of the contracting parties gives and receives an equivalent. (Wharton.)

côm-mû-ta-tive-ly, côm-mû-tâ-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. commutative; -ly.] In respect of or by way of exchange. (Brown.)

côm-mû-tâ-tôr, s. [Lat., from commutatus, p. par. of commutatio = to exchange.]

Elect.: An instrument which periodically interrupts an electric current. It is sometimes used as a name for a device for throwing into a circuit a greater or less amount of the force of a battery; and occasionally for a device for directing a current into several circuits in succession, the current being through only one circuit at a time. It seems to be used in the above senses by various standard electricians, but they all agree in one point in their use of it; i. e. that there is change, either of direction, strength, or circuit of the current. (Knight.)

côm-mû-te', v. t. & t. [Lat. commuto = to exchange; com = with; muto = to change.]

A. Transitive:

* I. Ordinary Language:

1. To exchange; to give or place one thing in exchange for another.

"This will commute our tasks..."—Decay of Piety.

2. To buy off or atone for one obligation by another.

"Some commute swearing for whoring; as if forbearance of the one were a dispensation for the other."—E. Strange.

3. To pay for in gross less than would be paid for each separate item combined; as, To commute the passage for a year (American, corresponding to our taking a season-ticket).

II. Law:

1. To change a punishment to one of a less degree of severity.

"... that her sentence should be commuted from burning to beheading."—Vacutay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

2. To give one thing as an exchange or equivalent for another, as to commute tithes for a rent-charge.

B. Intransitive:

* 1. To effect a commutation; to serve as an exchange or substitute.

"Those institutions, which God designed for means to further men in holiness, they look upon as a privilege to serve instead of it, and to commute for it."—South: Sermon.

2. To make an arrangement to pay in gross, especially in travelling (American); as we say, To take a season-ticket.

"Did sley this Fortinbras: who, by a seal'd compact,
Well ratified by law and heraldry,
Did forfeit, with his life, all those his lands."
Shakespeare: Hamlet, I. 1.

¶ Blackstone thus distinguishes between a law or rule, and a compact or agreement: "It [law] is also called a rule to distinguish it from a compact or agreement, for a compact is a promise proceeding from us, law is a command directed to us. The language of a compact is, 'I will or will not do this'; that of a law is, 'thou shalt or shalt not do it.' It is true there is an obligation which a compact carries with it, equal in point of conscience to that of a law; but then the original of the obligation is different. In compacts we ourselves determine and promise what shall be done before we are obliged to do it; in laws we are obliged to act without ourselves determining or promising anything at all. Upon these accounts law is defined to be a rule." (Blackstone: Comment., bk. i., introd., § 2.)

* B. As adj.: In league or confederacy; leagued.

"Thou pernicious woman, Compact with her that's gone."

"I scorn you, scurvy companion."
—Shakespeare: 3 Hen. IV., II. 4.

¶ An approach to this meaning still exists in the use of the word companion in such advertisements as—"Wanted, a companion to a lady." The paymistress and the lady paid can scarcely be considered as on a footing of equality, though the term companion does not now convey a contemptuous meaning as it once did.

"Arise, my knights of the battle; I create you Companions to our person."
Shakespeare: Cymbeline, v. 3.

(2) One who keeps company or associates with another on terms of equality; an associate, a comrade.

"No sweet companion near with whom to mourn."
—Prior.

(3) One who shares the fortunes or lot of another.

"... my brother and companion in labour."
—Psalm. li. 23.

¶ With the prep. of before the thing shared in.

"Which would be all his solace and revenge, These once to gain companion of his wee."
Milton: P. L., vi. 908.

2. Fig.: Applied to immaterial things, as one's thoughts or reflections, quiet, &c.; an accompaniment.

"How now, my lord? why do you keep alone?
Of sorriest fancies your companions make!"
Shakespeare: Macbeth, III. 2.

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. Fellowship, association, society; the act or state of being a companion.

"There was noon that Iyste ben his foo, But dide him al honour and companye." Chaucer: Leg. Good Wom. Ypsep, 40.

"As he thereon stood gazing, he might see The blessed Angels at and from desound From highest heven in gladsome companye." Spenser: F. Q., I. x. 54.

2. A companion, an associate.

"Alooe, withen eni compaignye." Chaucer: C. T., 3.204.

3. A number of persons associated together—

(1) For any business or object: a band, a troop, a body.

"Thys was a usayr compaignye." Rob. of Gloucester, p. 200.

"... it was long dangerous for men to travel this road otherwise than in companies."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

(2) For entertainment or pleasure: guests, visitors.

"Win higan to fallit to that like compaignyt." Kynth. Jesu, 1726.

(3) As attendants, companions, associates, or supporters of any person.

"Go, carry Sir John Falstaff to the Fleet; Take all his companies along with you." Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV., v. 5.

II. Figuratively:

1. Persons of good position or breeding; society.

"A gentleman who quoted Horace or Terence was considered in good company as a pompous pedant."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. liii.

2. A person possessing the qualities of a sociable and agreeable companion.

* 3. Sexual intercourse.

B. Technically:

1. Commerce:

(1) A number of persons legally associated for the performance of any duty or the carrying on of any business. The profits are divided amongst the members or shareholders in proportion to the amount of capital invested.

¶ When the persons combining together for commercial enterprise are but few, the association is generally called a copartnership; but when many are thus united the name given is company. Thus no one ever thought of applying the term copartnership [COPARTNERSHIP] to the late East India Company, or the Hudson's Bay Company. One division of companies is into exclusive or joint stock companies on the one hand, and open and regulated companies on the other. [JOINT STOCK.] In the former the enterprise is carried on by means of money previously raised by the sale of shares in the company to intending shareholders. The directors or those whom they employ manage the business; the shareholders do not trade with their part of the stock, but remain passive, except that they annually vote approval or the reverse of what has been done. Joint stock companies are divided into those of unlimited and those of limited liability. If a company of the former type fail, every shareholder is personally liable to the extent of all that he possesses for the debts which may have been incurred, with the expense of winding up. In a limited liability company again he is responsible only for any portion of his shares for which the money has not yet been called up.

"But there were some who held that our commerce with India would be best carried on by means of what is called a regulated Company."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

(2) The partners in any firm whose names do not appear in the title or style of the firm; in this use the word is generally contracted to Co.

(3) A society, corporation, or guild for the promotion and protection of the interests of any trade.

¶ Civic Companies or Corporations, specially those of London:

The United States never established trade corporations, and in 1816, Albert Gallatin, Esq., Secretary to the Treasury of that Republic, boasted that "Industry is in every respect free and unfettered; every species of trade, commerce, profession, and manufacture, being equally open to all without requiring any regular apprenticeship, admission, or licence." At home the privileges of the trade companies were found oppressive, and some of their franchises were taken from them, so that at last they remained little more than charitable societies.

(2) Present state: London, the great seat of the old guilds now mentioned, has seventy-six of them still existing. They are known as the London City Livery Companies. To these there must be added three which have no livery, making seventy-nine in all. Some have ceased to exist. Among these is the Longbow String-makers' Company, but the Bowyers (i.e. Bow-makers) still continue. £25 is the sum which one must pay to be admitted to their livery. Twelve companies being regarded as higher in dignity than the others have the title "Honourable" prefixed to their designation. The following are the names with the dates at which they are believed to have first arisen:—1. The Mercers (A. D. 1393). 2. The Grocers (1345). 3. The Drapers (1439). 4. The United Fishmongers (1536). 5. The Goldsmiths (1327). 6. The Skinners (1327). 7. The Merchant Taylors (1416). 8. The Haberdashers (1447). 9. The Salters (1553). 10. The Ironmongers (1462). 11. The Vintners (1436). 12. The Clothworkers (1482).

For the political privileges of the Livery Companies, see CORPORATION. No correct knowledge is possessed of the revenues of the Companies. In 1869 it was stated at £99,027 from endowments, besides a sum unstated from other sources. Many believe that Parliament has the right to divert to more profitable uses the funds now employed for the purpose for which they were originally raised; others take quite the opposite view, believing the money in question a kind of private property. A struggle between these antagonistic views is certain to occur.

2. Mil.: The smallest command of a captain of infantry. In the United States an infantry battalion consists of two or more companies, each officered by a captain, a first and a second lieutenant, five sergeants, and four corporals. In times of war a full company consists of 101 men and officers; in times of peace of 3 commissioned officers and 54 men. It is formed in two ranks. In England it forms one-eighth of a war battalion, and has little independent action; on the Continent the company, which is one-fourth of the war battalion, acts almost independently. In England the war strength of a company is 120, and the captain is unmounted; in the Continental armies it is 250. In Germany it is formed in three ranks, and the captain is mounted.

3. Nautical:

(1) The officers and crew of a ship.

(2) A fleet.

4. Theat.: The entire body of actors engaged at a theatre.

A. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Suitable for, or pertaining to, comparison; that may be compared or is so.

"The ancestors of the Jews and the Jews themselves, pass through every stage of comparative civilization."—Müller: Bibl. Rev. (3rd ed.), pref., vol. I, p. xxxv.

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: Involving or pertaining to the second of the three degrees of comparison; that in which only two persons or things are viewed together. It is formed by adding er to the positive, when this can be done without injuring euphony, as strong, stronger; large, larger. When the positive ends in y the y is changed into i before er is appended, as silly, sillier, goodly, goodlier. When this method of forming the degree of comparison would injure euphony, more is put before the word without being united to it, and er is not appended, as positive, faithful; comparative, more faithful.

2. Science: When human anatomy had been brought a certain distance towards perfection, attention was given to the anatomy of the superior animals, Cuvier leading the way. The corresponding parts of the several animals being naturally compared together with the view of tracing their resemblances and their variations, the science was called Comparative Anatomy. The same method was tried next, and with good results, on philology, and the science of comparative philology arose. It was then extended to mythology, and finally to the religions of the world.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A rival; one who is equal or aspires to be an.

"Gerard ever was His full comparative."

"In all cases it was the transference of motion from the ether to the comparatively gaseous molecules of the gas or vapour."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), VIII, xiv, p. 207.

com-par-a-tive-ness, s. [Eng. comparative; -ness.] The quality of being comparative.

com-par-a-tiv-ist, s. [Eng. comparative(e); -ist.] One who carries on investigations by means of comparison.

com-pa-rā-tōr, s. [Fr.] An instrument for accurately comparing the length of nearly equal measures. This is generally effected by two microscopes fitted with flar micrometers, and the slide, which carries the two measures to be compared, is so arranged that it moves them exactly behind one another in the micrometer line, and there retains them. In another form the expansion of metal by heat is employed as a test. The name is also given to an apparatus for testing colour.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of comparing, or bringing two or more things together for the purpose of estimating their relative qualities or properties.

"And have thy joys Lost nothing by comparison with ours?"
Cooper: The Task, bk. I.

"One of these alleys, called, and, by comparison, justly called, Broad Lane, is about ten feet wide."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. XII.

2. A quality or state of things admitting of being compared, as: "there is no comparison between them."

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: The act or process of comparing an adjective or adverb; the state of being compared.

2. Rhet.: A figure by which two things are compared together with respect to some quality or property common to both.

† Crabb thus discriminates between comparison and contrast: "Likeness in the quality and difference in the degree are requisite for a comparison; likeness in the degree and opposition in the quality are requisite for a contrast: things of the same colour are compared; those of an opposite colour are contrasted: a comparison is made between two shades of red; a contrast between black and white. Comparison is of a practical utility, it serves to ascertain the true relation of objects; contrast is of utility among poets, it serves to heighten the effect of opposite qualities; things are large or small by comparison; they are magnified or diminished by contrast; the value of a coin is best learnt by comparing it with another of the same metal; the generosity of one person is most strongly felt when contrasted with the meanness of another." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* 5. Hortic.: A bed, or border, composed of several different figures arranged with symmetry to adorn a parterre.

compartment-bulkheads, s. pl.

Naut.: Most of the iron ships have adopted the Chinese plan of dividing the hold ahwartship by strong watertight bulkheads into compartments, so that a leak in any one of them does not communicate with the others, thus strengthening a vessel, besides adding to its security. Compartment-bulkheads were first directed to be fitted, under the superintendency of Commander Belcher, in H. M. ships Erebus and Terror, at Chatham, for Arctic service, in 1835.

compartment- ceiling, s. One divided into panels, which are usually surrounded by mouldings. (Gwilt.)

compartment-tiles, s. pl. An arrangement of varnished red and white tiles on a roof. (Gwilt.)

* côm-part'-nër, s. [Pref. com = Lat. cum = with; Eng. partner (q.v.).] A partner, a sharer, a co-partner. (Pearson.)

* côm-part'-nër-ship, s. [Eng. partner; -ship.] Co-partnership, partnership.
"My wife's compartnership, my Kate's, my life's." — Ford: Perkin Warbeck, iv. 3.

* côm-pass, * com-pas, * cum-pas, s. & a. [O. Fr. compas; Sp. compas; Port. compasso, compaço; Ital. compasso; Low Lat. compassus = a circle, from Lat. com = with, and passus = a pace, a step.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

† (1) A circle. [TO FETCH A COMPASS.]

"Alle satte atte mete in compas aboute." — Chaucer: The Cooks Tale of Gamelyn, l. 623.

* (2) A going round, a circular way or course.

"A street was in round . . . and bar in to the seler of the temple by compas." — Wycliffe: Ecch. xli. 7.

† (3) An enclosing line, circuit, or circumference; a space enclosed in a circle.

"[Rome] now on seve high hills triumphant reigns, And in that compas all the world contains." — Dryden: Virgil; Georgic li. 784.

* (4) Space, room, limit, area.

"Ten mile compas al aboute." — Cursor Mundii, 2, 273.

(5) Extent.

"No less than the compas of twelve books . . ." — Pope: Essay on Homer's Battles.

2. Figuratively:

* (1) A circuit or course.

"My life is run his compas." — Shaksp.: Julius Cæsar, v. 8.

(2) Space or limits of time.

" . . . within the compas of one year. . ." — Atterbury.

(3) Due limits or bounds; moderation.

"Nothing is likelier to keep a man within compas, . . ." — Locke.

* (4) Form, appearance, shape.

"Ho watz the fayrest of compas & colour & coston." — Sir Gawayne, 943.

(5) Reach, capacity, extent.

" . . . past the compas of my wits." — Shaksp.: Romeo, iv. 1.

* (6) A going about, or by roundabout means, to effect anything; stratagem.

"Fortune . . . catches furthe his colde wirts with compas to eude." — Destr. of Troy, 2, 710.

* (7) Craft, cunning, art.

"Ther stont a trose . . . With compas it throwe and with ght i-do." — Castel of Love, 739.

II. Technically:

1. Carp.: A circumscribing instrument, or one for describing arcs or measurers' lines.

2. Music: The range or power of the voice or of any musical instrument; the extent of notes or sounds possible to be expressed by it.

"Through all the compas of the notes it ran, The diapason closing full in man." — Dryden: Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.

3. Magnetism: An instrument for determining horizontal direction by means of a poised magnetic needle. There are many kinds of it; the best known is the mariner's compass. [4.]

4. Naut.: The mariner's compass, which is a declination compass used in guiding the course of a ship. It is generally enclosed in a box, which again is placed in another and larger one, the latter termed the binnacle, the appropriate situation of which is the deck in the after part of the vessel. The magnetised needle, which is the essential part of the mariner's compass, is fixed to the lower part of a card, which may be made of ordinary cardboard, of a leaf of mica, or anything similar. By this arrangement, which is the most convenient one, the card revolves with the needle. It is marked not merely with the four cardinal points, but with various minor divisions so as to constitute 32 in all. To keep the compass in a horizontal position, notwithstanding the rolling of the ship, it is supported on gimbals. In an iron or steel vessel there is a deviation of the north and south line from the magnetic meridian, owing to the permanent magnetism of such a vessel. This is compensated for by placing a permanent steel magnet in the neighbourhood of the compass, which exerts an equal and opposite couple to that due to the ship. It is believed that the mariner's compass was in use in China first on land and then, after an interval, to guide ships on the sea. The name of its inventor has not been preserved. Nor is it known who introduced it into Europe, or when. Guyot de Provins, a French poet, who in A. D. 1190 wrote a satire called "La Bible," speaks of it, but having been a crusader he may have seen it in the East. If it had reached the West, it was scarcely known when he wrote, but about 1250 it began to be appreciated, and soon after came into general use.

¶ Azimuth Compass: [AZIMUTH.]

Declination Compass: An instrument intended to measure the magnetic declination of a place, when its astronomical meridian is known.

Inclination Compass: An instrument for measuring the magnetic inclination, or dip.

Mariner's Compass: The same as COMPASS, II. 4 (q.v.).

Prismatic Compass: The same as AZIMUTH COMPASS (q.v.).

Sine Compass: Elect.: A form of galvanometer for measuring powerful currents.

Tangent Compass:

Elect.: An instrument for measuring the intensity of a voltaic current in which a small needle is placed. The intensity of such a current being proportional to the angle of deflection, the instrument ascertains this deflection, after which its corresponding value is obtained from a table of tangents, and thus the intensity of the current is measured.

* III. In special phrases and compounds:

1. In compas, * in compas:

(1) Lit.: Around, round about. [A. I. 1.]

"Biholdyng he aboute that sateu in compas of hym." — Wycliffe: Mark iii. 34.

(2) Fig.: Within due limits or bounds; with due moderation.

2. Within compas: The same as in compas (2).

* 3. To fetch a compas: To go round in a circle, to form a circle or circular line.

"And the border shall fetch a compas from Amzon unto the river of Egypt. . . ." — Numb. xxxiv. 5.

¶ The expression translated in Acts xxvii. 13, "fetched a compass," appears in the revised version as "made a circuit."

* 4. To keep compas: To keep within bounds or moderation.

" . . . undertaking for him, that he should keep compas . . ." — King James: Witty Apothegms (1669).

* (2) A plan, a design.

"Many subtle compassinges
As tabes wyres and pyncles." Chaucer: House of Fame, ll. 99.

II. Technically:

1. Law: The act of plotting or entering into a design for the carrying out of any criminal act. Specially used of plotting the death of the king, which is treason. To provide weapons or ammunition for the purpose of killing the king, or to consult how the deed may be done, or to conspire to imprison him by force, are all held to be a violation of the law, which forbids the compassing of the king's death, and are high treason.

"Let us next see what is a compassing or imagin'g the death of the king, &c. There are synonymous terms; the word compass signifying the purpose or effect of the mind or will, and not, as in common speech, the carrying such design to effect."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. iv., ch. 8.

2. Naval Arch.: The act of bending timber into a curve for the building of ships. [COMPASS-TIMBER.]

côm-pâ-ssion (ssion as shôn), côm-pâ-ssioun, s. [O. Fr. compassion; Sp. compasion; Ital. compassione, from Lat. compassio = sympathy, from compassus, pa. par. of compassio = to suffer or sympathize with: com = cum = together; patiô = to suffer.]

1. Sing.: The act or state of sympathizing with the sufferings, troubles, or misfortunes of another; pity, commiseration, sympathy.

"Compassion is that species of affection, which is excited either by the actual distress of its object, or by some impending calamity which appears inevitable. The etymology of the word expresses this idea with strict propriety; as it signifies suffering with the object."—Cogan: On the Passions, § 3.

* 2. Pl.: An act of mercy or pity.

"Shew mercy and compassions every man to his brother."—Lech. vii. 9.

[For the difference between compassion, pity, and sympathy, see the latter words.]

* côm-pâ-ssion (ssion as shôn), v.t. [COMPASSION, s.] To have compassion on; to pity, to compassionate.

"O heavens! can you hear a good man groan,
And not relent, or not compassion him?" Shakspear: Tit. Andron., iv. 1.

* côm-pâ-ssion-a-ble, a. [Eng. compassion; -able.]

1. Deserving of or calling for compassion, pity, or mercy; pitiable.

"The judge should tender the party's case as compassionate, and desire that he may be delivered from the evil."—Barrow: Sermon, l. 282.

fâte, fât, fare, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hêr, there; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine, gô, pôť, er, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; müte, öüb, öüre, ünite, cür, räde, füll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ä. ssion as shün.

C. As subst.: The act of feeling compassion, pity, or sympathy; compassion.

*côm-pâ-ssion-at-ive, a. [Eng. compassionat(e); -ive.] Feeling compassion; compassionate.

"Nar would he have permitted his compassionate nature to imagine it belonged to God's mercy to change its condition in those that are damned, from pain to happiness."—Sir K. Digby: Observations on Brown's Religio Medici. (Latham).

*côm-pâ-ssioned (asion as shün), pa. par. or a. [COMPASSION; -v.]

*côm-pass-less, a. [Eng. compass; -less.] Having no compass. (Knowles in Webster.)

*côm-pass-ly, adv. [Eng. compass; -ly.] In proportion, fittingly, skillfully.

"... who made all compassly."—Sylvester: The Lives, p. 640. (Davies.)

*côm-pass-ment, *com-pace-ment, *com-passe-ment, s. [Eng. compass; -ment.] A contrivance, plan, or compassing.

"Through whos compassment and guile Fel many a man hath lost his wiles."—Gower, l. 237.

côm-past, pa. par. or a. [COMPASS, v.]

"The year begins his compass course anew."—Spenser: Sonnet, 62.

côm-pa-tèrn-i-ty, s. [Low Lat. compaternitas, from Lat. com = cum = with, and paternitas = the relation of a father; pater = a father.] The state or position of a godfather.

"Godsped, or compaternity, by the canon law, is a spiritual affinity; and a juror that was godsped to either of the parties might, in former times, have been challenged as not indifferent by our law."—Davies: State of Ireland.

côm-pât-i-bil-i-ty, *com-pet-i-bil-i-ty, s. [Fr. compatibilité; Ital. compatibilità.] The quality of being compatible, consistency; congruity, harmony with, compatibility.

"... the compatibility and concurrence of such properties in one thing."—Barrow, vol. II, serm. 9.

côm-pât-i-ble, *com-pet-i-ble, a. [Fr. & Sp. compatible; Port. compatível; Ital. compatibile; Low Lat. compatibilis, from Lat. compatior = to suffer together; wrongly taken by some as altered from competible (q.v.); from competo = to go or come together, . . . to strive for = com = together, and peto = to go, to . . . to seek. Pattenham in 1589 ranked this word among those then quite recently introduced into the language.] Consistent with, congruous, in harmony with, suitable, fit, agreeable to.

"... such qualities as are by nature the most compatible; valour with anger, meekness with piety, and prudence with dissimulation."—Broome.

(1) Rarely (followed by to):

"The object of the will is such a good as is compatible to an intellectual nature."—Male: Origin of Man-kind.

(2) Generally (followed by with):

"... and scarce compatible with his state at home."—Baker: Edw. III., an. 1347.

Crabst thus discriminates between compatible and consistent: "Compatibility has its principal reference to plans and measures; consistency to character, conduct, and station. Every thing is compatible with a plan which does not interrupt its prosecution; everything is consistent with a person's station by which it is neither degraded nor elevated. It is not compatible with the good discipline of a school to allow of foreign interference; it is not consistent with the elevated and dignified character of a clergyman to engage in the ordinary pursuits of other men." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côm-pât-i-ble-ness, s. [Eng. compatible; -ness.] The quality of being compatible; consistency, congruity, harmony, fitness, agreement.

côm-pât-i-ble, adv. [Eng. compatible; -ly.] In a compatible manner, consistently, congruously, harmoniously, in agreement with.

*côm-pâ-tient (tient as shent), a. [Lat. compatiens = suffering together, pr. par. of compatior, from com = together, and patior = to suffer.] Suffering together, compassionate. [COMPACIENT.]

"The same compatient and commoriant lates and times."—Sir G. Buck: History of King Richard III.

†côm-pât-ri-ôt, s. & a. [In Fr. compatriote.]

A. As subst.: One of the same country.

B. As adj.: Belonging to the same country.

"... some honour'd chief Of his compatriot villagers."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. VII.

*côm-pât-ri-ôt-ism, s. [Pref. com, and patriotism (q.v.).] The condition or state of being a compatriot, or of the same country.

*com-payn-ie, *com-payn-ye, s. [COMPANY.]

"Oret compaynye of hey men in Engeland."—Robert of Gloucester, p. 870.

côm-péar', v.t. [Lat. compareo = to be perfectly apparent, to appear, to be visible; con, and pareo = to appear, to come forth.]

Scots Law: To put in an appearance in a court of law; to appear either in person or by means of a counsel. (Stirling.)

côm-péar'-ance, s. [Scotch compare; -ance.] Scots Law: The act of putting in an appearance in a court of law. (Balcanquhal.)

côm-péar'-ant, s. [Scotch compare, and Eng. & suff. -ant.] The same as COMPEARER (q.v.).

côm-péar'-ër, s. [Scotch compare, and Eng. suff. -er.]

Scots Law: One who compares in a law court, specially if he do so spontaneously, to request that he shall be allowed to constitute himself a party to a suit as it affects his interest.

côm-péer, *com-per, *oum-per, s. [O. Fr. compeer, compair; Lat. compar, from com = cum = with, and par = equal.] A companion, a comrade, a mate; one equal in age or position; an equal.

"A gentill pardoner of Ronceval, his frend and his comper."—Chaucer: C. T., prol. 672.

"You thorn—perchance whose prickly spears Have fenced him for three hundred years, While fell around his great compeers . . ."—Scott: Marion, introd. to canto II.

*côm-péer, v.t. [COMPEER, s.] To equal, to match, to mate.

"In my rights, By me invested, he compeers the best."—Shakesp.: King Lear, v. 2.

*com-peer, v.t. [COMPEER, v.]

*com-peir, v.t. [COMPEER, v.]

*com-peir-ance, s. [COMPEARANCE, s.]

*com-peir-ant, s. [COMPEARANT, s.]

côm-pél', v.t. [O. Fr. compellir; Sp. compeler; Port. compellir, from Lat. compello = to drive together, to compel: com = cum = with, together, and pello = to drive.]

1. To force, to constrain, to drive, to oblige to do any act.

(1) With an infinitive expressing the act.

"... him they compelled to bear his cross."—Mark xvii. 22.

(2) With the prep. to and a noun to express the act.

"Compell'd to fight, they scatter wide."—Scott: The Lord of the Isles, vl. 23.

(3) With the act not expressed.

"He refused, and said, I will not eat; but his servants, together with the woman, compelled him."—1 Samuel xvii. 23.

2. To cause or bring to pass under compulsion, to force, to exact.

"The Crown had power to compel the attendance of witnesses."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

* 3. To take by force, to seize, to ravish from.

"... commissions which compel from each The sixth part of his substance, . . ."—Shakesp.: Henry VIII., l. 2.

* 4. To overpower, to seize.

"But essay sleep their weary limbs compell'd."—Dryden.

* 5. To gather close together into a body.

"Now friendly mix'd, and in one troop compell'd."—Dryden.

* 6. To rule over, to have power or authority over.

"The powers that I compel Shall throw this hence."—Chapman: Homer's Iliad, v. 650.

Crabst thus discriminates between to compel, to force, to oblige, and to necessitate: "Compulsion and force act much more directly and positively than oblige or necessitate; and the latter indicates more of physical strength than the former. We are compelled by outward or inward motives; we are obliged more by motives than any thing else; we are forced sometimes by circumstances, though oftener by plain strength; we are necessitated solely by circumstances. An adversary is compelled to yield who resigns from despair of victory; he is forced to yield if he stand in fear of his life; he is obliged to yield if he cannot withstand the entreaties of his friends; he is necessitated to yield if he want the strength to continue. An obstinate person must be compelled to give up his point; a turbulent and disorderly man must be forced to go where the officers of justice choose to lead him; an unreasonable person must be obliged to satisfy a just demand; we are all occasionally necessitated to do that which is not agreeable to us." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*côm-pél-la-ble, a. [Eng. compell; -able.] Capable of being compelled or constrained; liable to, or capable of, compulsion.

"Now in the state of Israel under kings, was there any earthly power by which those kings were compellable to any thing, or any subject allowed to resist them in any case whatsoever."—Hobbes: De Corpore Politico, pt. II, p. 78.

*côm-pél-la-ble, adv. [Eng. compellab(ile); -ly.] By way of compulsion.

*côm-pél-lâte, v.t. [Lat. compello.] To address, to speak to.

*côm-pél-lâ-tion, s. [Lat. compellatio, from compello (1st conj.) = to accost, from compello (3rd conj.) = to drive together.] The mode or style of salutation or address; supplication.

"The peculiar compellation of the kings in France is by 'sire,' which is nothing else but father."—Temple.

*côm-pél-la-tive, s. [Lat. compello = to accost, to address.]

Gram.: An appellation, an appellation.

*côm-pél-la-tôr-ÿ, a. [Formed as if from a Lat. compellatorius, from compello = to compel.] Compulsatory, compulsory.

"... a king and a queen to be constrained by process compellatory to appear in any court. . ."—Cavendish: Life of Cardinal Wolsey.

côm-pél-led, pa. par. & a. [COMPEL, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (In senses corresponding to those of the verb).

* B. As adj.: Enforced, involuntary.

"... finding ourselves too slow of sale, we put on a compelled valour . . ."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 7.

côm-pél-lér, s. [Eng. compel; -er.] One who compels or constrains another to any act.

"... what trust can the compeller have of the compelled?"—Styrie: Life of Sir T. Smith; On the Queen's Marriage.

côm-pél-ling, pr. par., a., & s. [COMPEL, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (In senses corresponding to those of the verb).

* B. As adj.: Exercising power or authority; restless.

C. As subst.: The act of forcing or constraining; compulsion, constraint.

*côm-pél-ling-ly, adv. [Eng. compelling; -ly.] By way of compulsion; compulsorily.

"Not evidently, compellingly necessarily."—Taylor: Real Presence, s. 2.

*com-pend, s. [COMPENDIUM.]

"Fix in memory the discourses, and abstract them into brief compendia."—Watts: Improv. of the Mind.

*côm-pên-di-är-i-ôus, a. [Lat. compendarius = of the nature of a compendium, sbrided.] Abridged, brief, concise, compendious. (Bailey.)

*côm-pënd-i-âto, v.t. [Lat. compendiatum, sup. of compendo = to sbridge.] To collect together or contain briefly or concisely, to epitomize.

"It concludeth in the last with that which concludeth and compendiateth all blessing, peace upon Israel."—Bp. of London: Vine Palatine (1614), p. 2.

côm-pên-di-ôs-i-ty, s. [Lat. compendiosus; ÿ collective, and Eng. suff. -ty.] The same as COMPENDIOUSNESS (q.v.).

*côm-pên-di-ôus, a. [Prov. compendios; Sp., Port., & Ital. compendioso, from Lat. compendiosus = (1) advantageous, (2) sbrided.]

1. Of a book, &c.: Abridged, summarised, in brief compass.

"... three things are required in the oration of a man having authority, that it be compendios, sententious and delectable."—Sir T. Elyot: Governour, II. 2.

2. Of anything:

(1) Summed up in short compass.

"For God is love—compendious whole Of all the blessings of a soul."—Byron: Love of God.

(2) Summary; direct, not circuitous in the method of operation.

cóm-pên-dî-ôus-lý, * cóm-pên-dî-ôuse-lý, adv. [Eng. compendiously; -ly.] In a compendious manner, in brief compass, with brevity, shortly.

"The state or condition of matter, before the world was a making, is compendiously expressed by the word chaos."—Bentley.

cóm-pên-dî-ôus-nëss, s. [Eng. compendious; -ness.] The quality of being compendious; brevity, shortness.

"The inviting easiness and compendiousness of this assertion, should dazzle the eyes."—Bentley; Serm.

cóm-pên-dî-üm (pl. compendia), s. [Lat. compendium = a hanging together, a laying up, a storing, . . . an abridgment, from com (con) = together, and pêndo = to cause to hang; Fr. compendium; Sp., Port., & Ital. compendio.] An abridgment.

I. Singular:
"After we are grown well acquainted with a short system, or compendium of a science, . . . it is then proper to read a larger regular treatise on that subject."—Watts: On the Mind.

† 2. Plural:
". . . was principally studied by Livy or in the classical compendia of Florus and Eutropius and in Plutarch's Lives."—Lewis: Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. 1, § 1, vol. 1, p. 1.

* cóm-pên-sa-ble, a. [O. Fr. & Sp. compensable.] Able to be compensated. (Johnson.)

cóm-pên-sâ-te, cóm-pên-sâ-te, v.t. & t. [From Lat. compensatum, sup. of compensare = to weigh together, to weigh one thing against another, freq. of compensare = to weigh together; com = together, and pêndo = to cause to hang down, to weigh.] [COMPENSE.]

A. Transitive:
1. Lit.: To pay the proper price for, to give adequate remuneration for services rendered, or an equivalent for losses sustained; to recompense, to pay.

" . . . I should at least secure my own, and be in part compensated."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. III.

2. Fig.: To furnish an equivalent for, to counterbalance, to make a sufficient set-off against.

"The pleasures of life do not compensate the miseries."—Prior.

"By is placed before that which is received in payment, and for precedes that for which the equivalent is given.

" . . . animated beings, ill compensated by the faint light of the satellites."—Herschel: Astron. (5th ed., 1835), § 22 b.

" . . . hints are thrown out of claims to territorial extension to compensate for the injury."—Times, Nov. 16, 1877.

B. Intrans.: To supply an equivalent, to make amends, atonement, or set-off. (Followed by for.)

" . . . but that blemish . . . was one for which no merit could compensate . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

cóm-pên-sâ-tëd, cóm-pên-sâ-tëd, pa. par. & a. [COMPENSATE, v.t.]

cóm-pên-sâ-tîng, cóm-pên-sâ-tîng, pr. par. or a. [COMPENSATE.]

† Compensating strips: [The same as COMPENSATION STRIPS (q.v.).]

cóm-pên-sâ-tion, s. & a. [Fr. compensation; Sp. compensacion; Port. compensação; Ital. compensazione, from Lat. compensatio.]

A. As substantive:
I. Ordinary Language:

† 1. The act of rendering an equivalent for.
† 2. That which constitutes an equivalent for something else.

(1) Lit.: That which is given or received as an equivalent for services rendered, losses sustained, sufferings endured, or in payment of a debt; amends, remuneration, payment, recompense.

" . . . partly as a compensation for their recent losses."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

(2) Fig.: That which balances or is an equivalent for something else, or makes good a deficiency.

1. Gen.: The same as A. I. (1).

2. Spec.: A stoppage or set-off. When one is sued for a debt, it is competent for him, partially or wholly, to bar the claim, by alleging that he is the plaintiff's creditor for services rendered or money lent. If the sum claimed from the plaintiff is found to be the exact equivalent of that for which he sues, the two are held to compensate or balance each other; if, on the contrary, it be less, it diminishes by so much the prosecutor's claim. If, however, the defendant feel that he owes the plaintiff more than that individual is indebted to him, he is required at the outset to pay into court the smaller sum for which he admits himself to be responsible. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. III, ch. xx.)

† Crabb thus distinguishes between compensation, satisfaction, amends, remuneration, recompense, requital, and reward. "The first three of these terms are employed to express a return for some evil; remuneration, recompense, and requital, a return for some good; reward, a return for either good or evil. A compensation is something real; it is made for some positive injury sustained; justice requires that it should be equal in value, if not like in kind, to that which is lost or injured: a satisfaction may be imaginary, both as to the injury and the return; it is given for personal injuries, and depends on the disposition of the person to be satisfied; amends is real, but not always made for injuries done to others, as for offences committed by ourselves. Sufferers ought to have a compensation for the injuries they have sustained through our means, but there are injuries, particularly those which wound the feelings, for which there can be no compensation: tenacious and quarrelsome people demand satisfaction; their offended pride is not satisfied without the humiliation of their adversary: an amends is honourable which serves to repair a fault; the best amends which an offending person can make is to acknowledge his error, and avoid a repetition . . . Compensation is made for bodily labour and menial offices; remuneration for mental exertions, for literary, civil, or political offices . . . A recompense is voluntary, both as to the service and the return; it is an act of generosity . . . Requital is a return for a kindness; the making it is an act of gratitude; the omission of it wounds the feelings: it sometimes (though not often) happens that the only requital which our kind action obtains, is the animosity of the person served." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

Hor.: A balance-wheel for a watch or chronometer, so constructed as to make isothermal (equal time) beats, notwithstanding changes of temperature. (Knight.)

compensation pendulum, s.
Hor.: A pendulum constructed of two different metals, as brass and iron, which so work against each other, that the expansion of the one downwards is counteracted by that of the other upwards. By this arrangement the pendulum does not vary in length, and consequently in frequency of vibration, whatever the temperature may be. Arnold's compensation balance-wheel for chronometers and watches is constructed on a similar principle.

compensation strips, s. pl. Two blades of copper and iron soldered together and fixed to the rod of a pendulum, the copper rod, which is the more expansible, being below the iron. As the temperature falls, the pendulum rod becomes shorter, but the strips, if in their normal state horizontal, now curve with the convex portion upwards. If again the temperature rises, the pendulum ball descends, but the strips, which now curve with their convexity downward, make a compensation for this. Both in the former case and in that now described, the centre of oscillation of the pendulum is not disturbed. Compensation strips are called also compensating strips. (Ganot: Physics, transl. by Atkinson, § 271.)

cóm-pên-sâ-tive, a. & s. [From Lat. compensatus (us), pa. par. of compensare; and Eng. auff. -ive, from Lat. -ivus.]

A. As adj.: Compensating, making good a loss.

B. As subst.: That which acts in a compensatory way; an equivalent.

cóm-pên-sâ-tôr, s. [Mod. Lat.]

I. Gen.: That which acts in a compensatory way; that which acts as an equivalent for something else.

II. Specialty:

1. Iron Bridges, &c.: Appliances used in iron bridges and similar structures with the view of giving the metal room to expand with heat. (Gardner.)

2. Navt.: An iron plate placed near the compass on board iron vessels to neutralize the effect of the local attraction upon the needle. (Knight.)

3. Gas-making: A device to equalize the action of the exhauster which withdraws the gas from the retorts. (Knight.)

cóm-pên-sa-tôr-ý, a. [Eng. & Lat. compensator, and Eng. auff. -y; Fr. compensatoire.]

1. Making good a loss or paying a debt.

2. Counterbalancing, countervailing, furnishing an equivalent for.

" . . . the compensatory lengthening of the preceding word."—Beanes: Comper. Gram. Arvan (1872), vol. 1, ch. IV, p. 282.

* cóm-pên-se, v.t. [Fr. compenser; Sp. & Port. compensar; Ital. compensare, from Lat. compensare.] To compensate, to recompense, to counterbalance. [Now it has given place to COMPENSATE (q.v.).]

"It seemeth, the weight of the quicksilver doth not compense the weight of a stone, more than the weight of the aqua-fortis."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

cóm-pêr, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The name given in Orkney to the Father-lasher (Cottus bubalis), a well-known fish.

* cóm-pêr-ân-dîn-â-te, v. [Lat. compendino = to cite a defendant to a new trial to be held on the third day afterwards; perendinas = after to-morrow.] To delay, to hold back.

* cóm-pêr-ên-dîn-â-tion, s. [Lat. comperendinatio = the putting a trial off until the third day.] Delay, dilatoriness. (Bailey.)

* cóm-pêr-tôr-ý-üm, s. [Lat. compertum, sup. of comperio = to bring up, to find out; com = with, and apertio = (1) to uncover, to lay bare; (2) to open.]

Civil Law: A judicial request made by delegates or commissioners to find out and establish the truth of a cause. (Parish Antiq., 575.)

cóm-pê-te, v.t. & t. [Lat. competo = to go together, . . . to seek together; com = together, and pêto = to go to, . . . to seek.]

I. Intransitive:

1. To seek together, or to seek what another is also striving at the same time to obtain. (Used of persons, of the inferior animals, or of things inanimate.)

" . . . it would undoubtedly be exposed to different conditions of life in the different islands, for it would have to compete with different sets of organisms."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. xiii, p. 461.

2. To claim equality with.

† II. Trans.: To engage in competition for anything.

cóm-pê-ten-çe, cóm-pê-ten-çý, s. [Dan. competence; Ger. kompetenz; Fr. compétence; Sp. & Port. competencia; Ital. competenza; Lat. competentia = a meeting together, agreement, symmetry, from competo.] [COMPETE.]

1. Gen.: Sufficiency.

"Something of speech is to be indulged to common civility, more to adroceries, and a competency to those recreative discourses which maintain the cheerfulness of society."—Government of the Tongue.

2. Spec.: Adequate pecuniary support, remote at once from want and from superfluity.

"He obtained from the royal bounty a modest competence; and he desired no more."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

1. Of persons:

(1) Legal ability or permission by law to act in a certain capacity. Thus the competence of a judge or a court to try a cause means that the cause is fairly within the jurisdiction of the judge or court, and the competence of a witness to give evidence means his legal capacity to do so. This depends on his not being challenged as infamous in character or personally interested in the case. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. III, ch. 23.)

(2) Legal capacity to do any act, as to make a will. It depends on age, soundness of mind, &c.

2. Of evidence: Admissibility.

cóm-pê-tent, * cóm-pê-tënte, a. [Dan. kompetent; Ger. kompetent; Fr. compétent; Sp., Port., & Ital. competente, from Lat. competens, pr. par. of competo.] [COMPETE.]

fâ-te, fât, fâ-re, âmidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hê-re, camêl, hêr, thê-re; pin, pît, sî-re, sîr, marî-no; gô, pôt, or, wô-re, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mû-te, cûb, cû-re, unî-te, ôur, râ-le, fâll; trý, Sý-rí-an. æ, œ = â. ey = a. qu = kw.

I. Ordinary Language:

- 1. Suitable, fit.
- 2. Proportionate, adequate.
- 3. Of things: Sufficient, able to produce certain effects.
- 4. Of persons: Qualified for any purpose or office; having physical, mental, or moral ability to do certain things or to occupy a certain place.

"Her father was perfectly competent to take care of himself."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.
 "... the competent mathematician of that day could predict what is now occurring in our own."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), III. 64.

II. Law:

- 1. Of evidence: Admissible in a law court.
- 2. Of persons: Legally qualified to do any particular thing or to fill any specified office.

"And he was competent whose purse was so."—Cowper: Task, II. 742.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between competent, fitted, and qualified: "Competency mostly respects the mental endowments and attainments; fitness the disposition and character; qualification the artificial acquirements or natural qualities. A person is competent to undertake an office; fitted or qualified to fill a situation. Familiarity with any subject, aided by strong mental endowments, gives competency; suitable habits and temper constitute the fitness; acquaintance with the business to be done, and expertness in the mode of performing it, constitute the qualification." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōm-pē-tēs-tōs, s. pl. [Lat. competentes, pl. of competens, pr. par. of competo.] [COMPETE.]
 Ch. Hist. An order of catechumens in the early Christian Church who were candidates for immediate baptism.

cōm-pē-tent-ly, adv. [Eng. competent; -ly.] In a competent manner, perfectly, suitably, proportionately.

"The flesh is either competently dry . . . or moist and excrementitious."—Fenner: Fla Recta, p. 92.

* cōm-pēt-ī-ble, a. [From Lat. competo = to seek together.] Suitable to, consistent with, able to be predicated of, applicable to.

- (1) Followed by with:
- "It is not competible with the grace of God so much as to incline any man to do evil."—Hammond.
- (2) Followed by to:

"The duration of eternity is such as is only competible to the Eternal God."—Sir M. Hale.

¶ Its place has been taken by COMPATIBLE (q.v.).

* cōm-pēt-ī-ble-ness, s. [Eng. competible; -ness.] Suitableness, fitness. [COMPATIBLE-NESS.]

cōm-pē-tīng, pr. par. & a. [COMPETE.]
 "... would increase immensely in numbers, were it not for other competing species . . ."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. vi., p. 175.

cōm-pē-tī-tion, s. [Sp. competición; Port. competição; from Lat. compellito = (1) an agreement, (2) a judicial demand, from competo.] [COMPETE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

- 1. The act of endeavouring to gain what another attempts to gain at the same time, and which as a rule only one can enjoy.

"To scenes where competition, envy, strife, Beget no thunder-clouds to trouble life."—Cowper: The Valediction.

¶ (1) Competition was formerly followed at times by to:

- "... competition to the crown."—Bacon.
- (2) Now for is used of the object striven for, and to or amongst of those who strive.

"... might well have been an object of competition to coevals . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

¶ An open competition for an appointment is a competition open to any one fulfilling certain qualifications who thinks fit to present himself. It is opposed to the more limited competition which takes place when only nominees of some person or office can enter.

2. The state of existing in permanent rivalry with another person or with another species. It may be used of all animated beings.

"For it should be remembered that the competition will generally be most severe between those forms which are most nearly related to each other in habits, constitution and structure."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. IV., p. 121.

II. Polit. Econ.: The struggle which each one makes for his own interest against that of others. A shopman, for instance, tries to draw customers around him by underselling his rivals. Such competition tends to fix the price of articles as low as the law of supply and demand will permit. When there is no adulteration, use of short weights, or other fraud, it is of great benefit to the public.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between competition, emulation, and rivalry: "Competition expresses the relation of a competitor, or the act of seeking the same object; emulation expresses a disposition of the mind towards particular objects; rivalry expresses both the relation and the disposition of a rival. Emulation is to compete as the motive to the action; emulation produces competitors, but it may exist without it: they have the same marks to distinguish them from rivalry. Competition and emulation have honour for their basis; rivalry is but a desire for selfish gratification. A competitor strives to surpass by honest means; he cannot succeed as well by any other: a rival is not bound by any principle; he seeks to supplant by whatever means seem to promise success. An unfair competitor and a generous rival are equally unusual and inconsistent. Competition animates to exertion; rivalry provokes hatred; competition seeks to merit success; rivalry is contented with obtaining it." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) cōm-pēt-ī-tive, a. [From Lat. competitivus, pr. par. of competo = to seek together; and Eng. suff. -ive.] Pertaining to competition, involving competition. (H. Martineau.)

¶ Not an old word, but now firmly rooted in the language.

cōm-pēt-ī-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. competitive; -ly.] By means of competition.

cōm-pēt-ī-tive-ness, s. [Eng. competitive; -ness.] The quality of being competitive.

cōm-pēt-ī-tōr, s. [Fr. compétiteur; Ital. competitore, from Lat. competitor.] [COMPETE.]

- * 1. An associate, one struggling not against but in alliance with another.

"And every hour more competitors Flock to the rebels, and their power grows strong."—Shakespeare: Richard III., IV. 4.

- 2. A person who competes; one who engages in a struggle mental, physical, or both with a rival, to become the sole possessor of some desirable object at which both aim.

"... some of his servants were in correspondence with his competitor . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

¶ It may be used also of animals or of species severally.

"... the number of species of all kinds, and therefore of competitors, decreases northwards."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. III., p. 69.

* cōm-pēt-ī-tōr-y, a. [Eng., &c. competitor; -y.]

- 1. Engaged in competition.
- 2. Involving competition, pertaining to competition.

"This work was written as a competitory treatise."—Faber: Difficulties of Infidelity, pref.

* cōm-pēt-īt-ress, s. [Eng., &c. competitor, and fem. suff. -ess.] A female competitor, a competitor (lit. & fig.).

"The two famous flourishing Universities, Oxford and Cambridge; with whom the Grecian Athlete itself was no fit competitor . . ."—Hierogonisticon, or Cora's Doom (1672), p. 136.

* cōm-pēt-ī-trix, s. [Lat.] A female competitor, a competitor.

"Queen Anne, being now without competitor for her title . . ."—Ld. Herbert: Hist. of Henry VIII.

cōm-pī-lā-tion, s. [Sw. & Ger. kompilation; Dan. & Fr. compilation; Sp. compilación; Port. compilação; Ital. compilazione, from Lat. compilatio = a raking together, a pillaging, a plundering.] [COMPILE.]

- 1. The act of compiling.
- 2. A book without original research, the materials for the composition of which have been drawn from various authors.

"... signs his performances for readers of a more refined appetite, fall into the hands of a devourer of compilations, what can he expect but contempt and confusion!"—Goldsmith: The Bee, I., introd.

† cōm-pī-lā-tōr, * cōm-pī-lā-tōur, s. [Sw. kompilator; Ger. kompilator; Fr. compilateur; Port. compilador; Ital. compilatore, from Lat. compilator = a plunderer of literary or other property.] The same as COMPILE (q.v.).

cōm-pī-le, * cōm-pī-lye, v.t. [Sw. kompilera; Dan. compilere; Ger. kompilieren; Fr. compiler; Sp. & Port. compilar; Ital. compilare, from Lat. compilo = to rob, to plunder.]

- * 1. Gen.: To put any thing or things together. Especially—

(1) Of a wall or building: To put together, to build, to construct.

"He did intend A brazen wall in compass to compyle About Cairnmarin."—Spenser: F. Q., III. III. 10.

(2) To combine; to frame by means of combination.

"So great perfectious did in her compile, Sith that in advance forests she did dwell."—Spenser: F. Q., III. vi. 1.

"Monsters compiled and complicated of divers parents."—Donne: Devotions, p. 68.

2. Spec. (of books or anything similar):

(1) To compose without ita being implied that what is thus produced emanated originally from others.

"Longaville Did never sunset for her compile."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour Lost, IV. 2.

(2) To bring together or collect facts or literary extracts from various authors, trusting to the accuracy of their research instead of making investigations of one's own.

* cōm-pī-le, s. [COMPILE, v.] Accumulation. (N.E.D.)

cōm-pī-lye, pa. par. & a. [COMPILE.]

* cōm-pī-lye-mēt, s. [Eng. compile; -mēt.] The act of compiling, piling, or heaping together; the state of being compiled.

"There is a moral as well as a natural or artificial compilement."—Wotton: On Education.

cōm-pī-lēr, * cōm-pī-lar, * cōm-pī-lour, s. [Eng. compil(e); -er.] One who composes a book of literary materials derived from various authors without original research.

"Some painful compilers, who will study old language . . ."—Sveft.

cōm-pī-līng, pr. par. [COMPILE.]

* cōm-pī-ŋgo, v.t. [Lat. compingo = to fix together; com = cum = with, and pingo = to fasten, to fix.] To compress, to shut up.

"... into what straight has it been compinged."—Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy.

cōm-pī-tā-l, a. [COMPITALIA.]

Roman Antiquities:

- 1. Pertaining to cross roads, or to the shrines of the gods at street corners in ancient Rome.

- 2. Pertaining to the Compitalia.

cōm-pī-tā-ly-a, s. pl. [Lat., from compitalis = pertaining to cross roads; compitum = a place where two or more roads meet.]

Roman Festivals: A movable festival in honour of the Lares, held at Rome about the beginning of January, at a place where several roads met. Originally human sacrifices were offered, but after the expulsion of the Tarquins these were exchanged, at the instance of Junius Brutus, for offerings of garlic and poppy-heads.

"... at the same time, he institutes the Compitalia—certain annual sacrifices offered by every household at chapels of the lares, in which the administration was to be performed by slaves, a religious ceremony which was still celebrated in this form at the time of Dionysius."—Leasia: Cred. Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. 21, § 29, vol. I., p. 447.

* cōm-plā-cēnce, cōm-plā-cēncy, s.

[In Sp. & Port. complacencia; Ital. complacenza; Low Lat. complacencia, from Class. Lat. placere = to be pleasing to more persons than one; com = together, and placere = to please. [COMPLAISE.] Heylin, in 1656, marked complacency with unusual words, but it has now thoroughly established itself in the language.]

I. Subjectively:

- 1. Traugall satisfaction of mind or heart.

"Nor in their ways complacence find."—Milton: P. L., VIII. 433.

"... with that sort of interest and complacency with which men observe a curious experiment in science."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. II.

2. The manifestation to another of the inward satisfaction which his or her character or conduct excites; civility, courtesy, goodwill, softness of speech or of manners towards a one.

“... his rudeness and want of complacency.”—Clarendon.
 “Yet still with looks in mild complacency drest.”
Cowper: Verses to the Memory of Dr. Lloyd.
II. Objectively: A being, person, or thing producing such satisfaction.
 “O Thou,
 My sole complacency, well thou know'st how dear
 To me are all my works.” Milton: P. L., III. 276.

com-plā-çent, a. [Ital. complacente; Lat. complacens, pr. par. of complaceo.] [COMPLACENCE.] Possessed of a tranquil satisfaction, satisfied.

com-plā-çen-ti-al (tl as sh), a. [Eng. complacent; † connective; and suff. -al.] Causing satisfaction or pleasure.

“The more high and excellent operations of complacential love.”—Baxter: Life and Times (1696), p. 7.

com-plā-çen-ti-al-ly (tl as sh), adv. [Eng. complacently; -ly.] In a manner to cause pleasure; in an accommodating way.

com-plā-çent-ly, adv. [Eng. complacently; -ly.] To a complacent or satisfied manner.

com-plāin', * com-playne, * com-pleigne, * com-plein, * com-pleyne, v. i. & t. [O. Fr. complaindre, from Low Lat. complango = to bewail; com = cum = with, and plango = to bewail; Ital. compiangere; O. Sp. complañir.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To express grief or pain; to mention with sorrow joined to some slight resentment, to murmur.

(1) Absolutely.

“Thus wepede she compleigneth.” Gower, l. 74.

(2) With the cause expressed—

(a) By the prep. for.

“Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins?”—Lamentations III. 30.

(b) By the prep. of.

(c) By the prep. on.

“That I, like thee, on Friday might complain.” Dryden: Cook & Fox, 497.

(d) By a clause introduced by the conj. that.

“... gently complained that no private roof, however friendly, gave the wanderer so warm a welcome . . .”—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. III.

2. To inform against, to accuse.

“Now master Shallow, who was complained of me to the council!”—Shakespeare: Merry Wives, l. 1.

† 3. To all; to suffer from some complaint. [Colloquial.]

“Wounded soldier! ! I complaining, Sleep me here and catch your death!”
Macneil: Wages of War, p. 3.

* B. Reflexive: To address or turn in complaint.

“Where then, alas! may I complain myself?”
Shakespeare: Richard II., l. 2.

* C. Trans.: To mourn or lament over; to bewail.

“They returned and complained her grete loss.”

He thus discriminates between to complain, to murmur, and to repine: “The idea of expressing displeasure or dissatisfaction is common to these terms. Complaint is not so loud as murmuring, but more so than repining. We complain or murmur by some audible method; we may repine secretly. Complaints are always addressed to some one; murmurs and repinings are often addressed only to one's self. Complaints are made of whatever creates uneasiness, without regard to the source from which they flow; murmuring is a species of complaints made only of that which is done by others for our inconvenience; when used in relation to persons, complaint is the act of a superior; murmuring that of an inferior; repining is always used in relation to the general disposition of things.” (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* com-plāin', s. [COMPLAIN, v.] A complaint.

“... promise of her love complain.”
Knuts: Lantia.

* com-plāin'-a-ble, a. [Eng. complain; -able.] Subject to complaint; liable to or deserving of being complained of.

“... superstition is the less complainable.”—Feltham: Resol., II. 35.

com-plāin'-ant, s. [Fr. complainant, pr. par. of complaindre = to complain.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who complains or makes complaint.

“Congreve and this author are the most eager complainants of the dispute.”—Collier: Defence.

II. Law:

1. One who enters a complaint or commences a criminal prosecution against another; a prosecutor.

2. One who enters a civil action against another; a plaintiff.

com-plāin'-er, * com-playn-our, * com-playn-er, s. [Eng. complain; -er.] One who complains, a complainant.

“Speechless complainer, I will learn thy thought.”
Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, III. 2.

com-plāin'-ing, * com-playn-ing, * com-pleign-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [COMPLAIN, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of making or uttering a complaint; bewailing, lamenting; the act of accusing or charging; a complaint.

“And the complainour has been founde to his complaining to verie chancelous false, that he hadde been answered that he was to easely dealt with, and hadde wrong that he was no worse served.”—Sir T. More: Works, p. 906.

com-plāint, * com-playnte, * com-pleinte, * com-pleynte, s. [Fr. complainte.] [COMPLAIN, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of complaining, or of giving utterance or expression to grief, regret, or resentment; a murmuring.

“Tho was compleinte on every side.”
Gower, t. III.

2. The cause or ground of complaining.

“The complaint of the electors of England was that now, in 1621, they were unfairly represented.”—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

3. An expression of grief, regret, or resentment.

4. A remonstrance or murmuring against the conduct of another. [II.]

“Full of vexation, come I with complaint Against my child.”
Shakespeare: Midw. Night's Dream, l. 1.

5. A bodily illness or cause of complaint; a disease or malady.

II. Law: A formal allegation or charge against any person or persons for some injury or crime committed; an information.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between complaint and accusation: “Both these terms are employed in regard to the conduct of others, but the complaint is mostly made in matters that personally affect the complainant; the accusation is made of matters in general, but especially those of a moral nature. A complaint is made for the sake of obtaining redress; an accusation is made for the purpose of ascertaining the fact or bringing to punishment. A complaint may be frivolous; an accusation false.” (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

—Hubert.

com-plāis'-a-çe, * com-plāi'-a-çe, s. [Fr.] [COMPLACENCE.] A disposition characterized by a desire to please, oblige, or gratify; courtesy, civility.

“A fifth law of nature is complaisance; that is to say, That every man strive to accommodate himself to the rest.”—Hobbes: Of Man, pt. I., ch. xv.

¶ Generally followed by the prep. to.

“In complaisance to all the fools in town.”
Young: Love of Fame, Sat. 6.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between complaisance, condescension, and deference: “Complaisance is the act of an equal; deference that of an inferior; condescension that of a superior. Complaisance is due from one well-bred person to another; deference is due to all superiors in age, knowledge, or station, whom one approaches; condescension is due from all superiors to such as are dependant on them for comfort and enjoyment.” (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

com-plāis'-ant, a. [Fr.] [COMPLACENT.] Soft, gentlemanly, benevolent, polite. (Sharp.)

com-plāis'-ant-ly, adv. [Eng. complaisant; -ly.] In a complaisant manner; with complaisance, courtesy, or civility.

“Is plenty starving, tantaliz'd in state,
 And complaisantly help'd to all I hate.”
Pope: Moral Essays; Ep. IV., 163-4.

* com-plāis'-ant-ness, s. [Eng. complaisant; -ness.] The quality of being complaisant; complaisance, civility.

* com-plān'-ate, v. t. [Lat. complanatus, sup. of complano = to make smooth or level.] [PLANE.] To make level, smooth, or even; to level.

“Made short and complanated.”—Derham: Phys. Theol., bk. v., ch. 2.

* com-plān'-ate, a. [Lat. complanatus, pa. par. of complano = to make smooth or level.] Made level, smooth, or even; levelled, flattened.

The act of spoyle; and all in fire, he burn'd him compleate arm'd."
Chapman: Homer's Iliad, bk. vi.

† Blair thus discriminates between entire and complete: "A thing is entire by wanting none of its parts; complete by wanting none of the appendages that belong to it. A man may have an entire horse to himself, and yet not have an entire complete apartment." (Blair: Lect. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres (1817), vol. i., p. 230.)

† Crabb thus discriminates between complete, perfect, and finished: "That is complete which has no deficiency: that is perfect which has positive excellence; and that is finished which has no omission in it." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

For the difference between complete and whole, see WHOLE.

cóm-pléte, * cóm-pléat, v. t. [In Fr. compléter.] [COMPLETE, a.]

1. To bring to a state of perfection, to perfect, to fulfil, to accomplish; to carry out to the complete end.

2. To finish, to bring to an end, to perform.

thing else, or a dislike to the thing in which we are engaged. Terminating respects discussions, differences, and disputa. Light minds undertake many things without completing any." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cóm-plé't-éd, * cóm-pléat-éd, pa. par. or a. [COMPLETE, v.]

"... the complexion of all good perfection of our nature, and our entire and satisfying enjoyment of it."—Hopkins : Works, p. 334, Ser. 2.

2. The state or quality of being complex; complexity.

"... it is properly called a simple syllogism, since the complexion does not belong to the syllogistic form of it."—Watts.

3. The colour or outward appearance of anything material.

"Meo judge by the complexion of the sky."

Shaksp. : Rich. II., III. 2.

4. The nature, general appearance, or character.

"The dietion is to follow the images, and to take its colour from the complexion of the thoughts."—Pope : Homer's Odyssey; Postscript.

5. The mental or moral qualities or character.

"Writers indulgent to the peculiarities of their complexion."—Burke : Lett. to Member of Nat. Assembly.

B. Ethn. : In the same sense as A. 1. 2. Dr. Richard arranges the complexions of the several varieties of man under three types:—

(1) The Melanocomous or Black-haired type. It varies greatly in the depth of its hue, from the intense black of the negro, through the dark red of the American Indian to the brownish yellow colour, improperly called olive, of the Eastern Asiatic, its extreme being the slightly dark tinge of the black-haired individuals or tribes of Europe.

(2) The Xanthous, or Yellow-haired type. The hair, nominally yellow, may also be light brown, auburn, or red. The skin is fair, the eyes blue or grey. The majority of the Teutonic race, including the English, are of this type. It may spring up anywhere among the Black-haired races of men, and does so when these are subjected for generations to cold. Thus there are fair-haired blue-eyed Jews, Afghans, &c.

(3) The Leucous or Albino, with the absence of colouring matter in the hair and eyes, the former being fleecy white, the latter pink. It exists sporadically in hot countries, among the dark-haired races of mankind, and is a morbid rather than a healthy state of the bodily frame. A strictly analogous change is seen in several of the lower animals. [ALBINO.]

* cōm-plēx-ion (plexion as plēck-shōn), v.t. [COMPLEXION, s.] To endow or endue or characterize with a complexion.

"Charity is a virtue that best agrees with coldest natures, and such as are complexioned for humility."—Str T. Browne : Religio Medici.

* cōm-plēx-ion-ā-bly (plexion as plēck-shōn), adv. [Apparently from an adj. complexionable, which is not found, but probably a misprint for complexionally (q.v.).] In the way of constitution or temperament; constitutionally.

"Heads that are disposed unto schism, and complexionably propense to innovation, are naturally disposed for a community..."—Str T. Browne : Religio Medici.

* cōm-plēx-ion-al (plexion as plēck-shōn), a. [Eng. complexion; -al.] Of, pertaining to, or dependent on the complexion or temperament of mind or body.

"Men and other animals receive different figures from complexional effluences..."—Brown.

* cōm-plēx-ion-al-ly (plexion as plēck-shōn), adv. [Eng. complexional; -ly.] In way of complexion or temperament; constitutionally. (Brown.)

* cōm-plēx-ion-ar-ry (plexion as plēck-shōn), a. [Eng. complexion; -ary.] Of or pertaining to the complexion; complexional.

"... this complexionary art and use of adorning..."—Sp. Taylor : Art's Handson, p. 38.

cōm-plēx-ioned (plexioned as plēck-shōnd), pa. par. or a. [COMPLEXION, v.]

1. Lit. : Having a complexion (generally with a descriptive adjective or adverb).

"... abundance of ruddy complexioned children."—Pope : Letter to a Lady.

2. Fig. : Having a colour or outward appearance.

"Scarce ended they this song, but Avon's winding stream, By Warwick, entertains the high-complexion'd Drayton; Poly-Oibion, s. 13.

+ cōm-plēx-ion-less (plexion as plēck-shōn), a. [Eng. complexion; -less.] Having no complexion; colourless.

"Those four male personages, although complexionless and eyebrowless..."—Dickens : Uncomm. Traveller, xxv.

cōm-plēx-ī-ty, s. [Fr. complexité.] [COMPLEX, a.] The quality or state of being complex or complicated; intricacy, complication.

"... I can see no limit to the amount of change, to the beauty and infinite complexity of the coadaptations between all organic beings."—Darwin : Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. iv, p. 196.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between complexity, complication, and intricacy: "Complexity expresses the abstract quality or state; complication the act: they both convey less than intricacy; intricacy is that which is very complicated. Complexity arises from a multitude of objects, and the nature of these objects; complication from an involvement of objects; and intricacy from a winding and confused involution. What is complex must be decomposed; what is complicated must be unravelled; what is intricate must be unravelled. A proposition is complex; affairs are complicated; the law is intricate. Complexity puzzles; complication confounds; intricacy bewilders." (Crabb : Eng. Synon.)

* cōm-plēx-ī-ly, adv. [Eng. complex; -ly.] In a complex, involved, or intricate manner; intricately, not simply.

"... as it is increased and so complexly corruption of nature..."—Goodwin : Works, vol. III, pt. 1, p. 282.

* cōm-plēx-nēss, s. [Eng. complex; -ness.] The state or quality of being complex; intricacy, complexity. (A. Smith.)

* cōm-plēx-ūre, s. [Eng. complex; -ure.] The involution or complication of one thing with others.

"... we reduce our love to that degree of implicit which is compatible with this our complexure."—W. Montaigne : Devout Essays, pt. 1, tract. 14, § 3-8. (Rich.)

cōm-plēx-ūs, s. [Lat. = a surrounding, encompassing, encircling, embracing, from complexor, perf. par. of complexor = to fold, or twine together, to clasp around: com = together, and the root plec = a fold.]

complexus muscle, s.
Anat. : A muscle inserted into the large internal impression between the two curved lines of the occipital bone. Above its middle it is partly intersected by a tendon sometimes described separately as the biventer cervicis. (Quain.)

* com-pleyne, v. [COMPLAIN.]

* com-pleynte, s. [COMPLAINT.]
"Robynge in hire compleynte."—Chaucer : Troilus, IV. 714.

* com-pli, s. [COMPLINE.]
"The monkes song complyt." Baker, 2, 97a.

cōm-plī-ā-ble, a. [Eng. comply; -able.]

* 1. Accommodating, complaisant, apt or disposed to compliance; compliant.

"I read your looks, and see compliance there." Goldsmith : An Oratorio, II.

2. The act of complying or agreeing with the wishes of others; submission, agreement, assent.

(1) Absolutely.
"What compliances will remove dissension..."—Swift.

(2) Followed by the prep. to.
"I am far from excusing that compliance... to his destruction."—King Charles.

(3) Followed by the prep. with.
"... his ready compliance with the wishes of his people."—Macaulay : Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

* 3. Agreement, suitability, accord (followed by the prep. to).

"... in compliance to their characters..."—Pope : Homer's Odyssey; Postscript.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between compliance, conformity, yielding, and submission: "Compliance and conformity are voluntary; yielding and submission are involuntary. Compliance is an act of the inclination; conformity an act of the judgment; compliance is altogether optional; we comply with a thing or not at pleasure; conformity is binding on the conscience; it relates to matters in which there is a right and a wrong. Compliance and conformity are produced by no external action on the mind; they flow spontaneously from the will and understanding; yielding is altogether the result of foreign agency." (Crabb : Eng. Synon.)

* cōm-plī-an-ēy, s. [Eng. compliance(e); -y.] A disposition or inclination to comply with the wishes of others.

"... a whole bearing betokened compliance..."—Goldsmith : Essays.

cōm-plī-ant, * cōm-plī-ant, a & s. [Eng. comply; -ant.] [COMPLY.]

A. As adjectives :

* 1. Yielding, bending, giving way, pliant.

"Nectarine fruits which the compliant boughs Yielded them sidelong as they sat." Milton : P. L., IV. 331.

"... she was chaste and loving, fruitful and discreet, humble and pleasant, witty and compliant, rich and fair..."—Sp. Taylor, vol. III, Ser. 8.

3. Assenting, agreeing.

"... to show how compliant he was to the humours of the princes..."—Burnet : Hist. of Reformation (1809).

B. As subst. : One who, or that which, complies, agrees, or assents.

"Being a compliant with the Papists."—Fuller : Ch. Hist., XI. x. s. (Davies.)

cōm-plī-ant-ly, adv. [Eng. compliant; -ly.] In a compliant, complaisant, or obliging manner. (Richardson.)

* cōm-plī-ca-ēy, s. [Lat. complicatio.] [COMPLICATION.] Complication, complex nature.

"Among the earliest tools of any complication which a man of letters gets to handle are his class-books."—Carlyle : Sartor Resartus, bk. II, ch. III. (Davies.)

cōm-plī-āte, v.t. [Lat. complicatus, pa. pa. of complicō = to knit or twist together: com = cum = with; plīco = to twist, to knit; Fr. complicquer; Sp. & Port. complicar.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) To form or make up into one mass by the combination of several constituent parts or elements.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

"Whoever compoundeth any like it, or whosoever putteth any of it upon a stranger, shall even be cut off from his people."—Exod. xxx. 33.

(2) To combine, to mix up several ingredients.

(8) To mix (followed by the prep. with). "Compounded it with dust, whereto 'tis kin."—Shakep.: Hamlet, iv. 2.

(4) To compose, to form a constituent part or element of.

2. Figuratively: (1) To combine, to mingle, or to associate together, to blend.

"... and compounding all the materials of fury, havoc, and desolation, into one black cloud..."—Burke's Speech on the Case of the Nabob of Arcot.

(2) To compose, to make up, to form. "To have his pomp, and all what stinks compounds, But only painted, like his varnish'd friends."—Shakep.: Timon, iv. 2.

(8) To arrange, to adjust, to settle, as differences, &c. "I pray, my lords, let me compound this strife."—Shakep.: 2 Hen. VI., ii. 1.

* (4) To write, to compile, to be author of. "Lucian's attempt in compounding his new dialogue."—Burd.: Manner of Writing Dialogues, Pref.

(6) To compromise, to excuse, to make a composition for. [A. II. 2 (1).]

"Compound for sin they are inclin'd to, By damning those they have no mind to."—Butler: Hudibras, c. 1, pt. 1, l. 215-16.

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: To form into one word by combination of two or more.

2. Law: (1) To discharge or satisfy, as a debt or obligation by the payment of a less sum than is strictly due; to make or accept a composition for. [COMPOSITION, B. 3.]

"Shall I, ye gods! he cries, my debts compound?"—Gay.

(2) To compound a felony: To forbear prosecution for any consideration. It was formerly held to make the person compounding an accessory; now it is punishable by fine and imprisonment. By 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, to advertise a reward for stolen goods, or print such an advertisement furnished by another, subjects one to a penalty of £50. One who prosecutes on account of a wrong done to himself can withdraw from the prosecution. [THEFT-NOTE.]

(3) To compound an information: The offence of revealing a crime and commencing a prosecution against the offender, not with the intention of going on but to be paid, or in popular phrase to be "squared," for desisting. This is a punishable offence. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 10.) A penal action by a common informer cannot be compounded except by leave of the court.

B. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language: * 1. To come to terms by abatements on both sides; to agree.

"Paracelsus and his admirers have compounded with the Galenists..."—Sir W. Temple.

* 2. To bargain, to make terms or arrangements; especially, at the Universities, to compound for fees by paying down a lump sum.

"Here's a fellow will help you to-morrow: compound with him by the year."—Shakep.: Measure for Measure, iv. 2.

(2) To settle by a compromise; to discharge or satisfy an obligation by compromise or mutual arrangement.

"They were, at last, glad to compound for his bare commitment to the Tower."—Clarendon.

* 4. To determine, to agree or decide. "We here deliver, Subscribed by the consuls and patricians, Together with the seal o' th' senate, what We have compounded on."—Shakep.: Coriol., v. 5.

5. To give out, to fail (as a horse in a race). (Slang.)

II. Technically:

1. Law: To discharge or satisfy a debt or obligation by the payment of a sum agreed upon which is less than is strictly due (followed by for before the debt or obligation compounded, and with before the persons with whom the composition is made).

2. Med.: To mix up drugs according to the prescription of a physician.

"Crabb thus discriminates between to compound and to compose: "Compound is used only in the physical sense; compose in the proper or moral sense: words are compounded by making two or more into one; sentences are composed by putting words together so as to make sense." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

com·pound (1), a. & s. [COMPOUND, v.]

A. As adjective: I. Ord. Lang.: Composed or compounded of two or more elements, parts, or ingredients: composite, not simple.

II. Bot.: Composed of or divided into two or more others. [COMPOUND FLOWER, COMPOUND LEAF, &c.]

B. As subst.: Anything which is composed or compounded of two or more elements, parts, or ingredients; the result of composition; a combination.

"... and the secondary compounds are found to be excreted from the system by means of particular organs."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. 1, p. 46.

"Crabb thus discriminates between compound and complex: "The compound consists of similar and whole bodies put together; the complex consists of various parts linked together: adhesion is sufficient to constitute a compound; involution is necessary for the complex." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

compound acids, a pl. Chem.: Colligated acids.

compound addition, a. [ADDITION.]

compound animal, s. An animal which, originally simple, develops into a few or many others, which retain physical connection with the parent instead of being sooner or later detached in the normal way. A loose expression for the Polyzoa and some of the Tubicula.

"Our conception of a compound animal, where in some respects the individuality of each is not completed."—Darwin: Voyage Round the World (ed. 1870), ch. ix., p. 203.

compound arch, s.

Arch.: An arch which has the archivolt moulded or formed into a series of square recesses and angles, and practically consisting of a number of concentric archways successively placed within and behind each other.

compound ascidians, s. pl.

Zool.: A division of Ascidians in which the structure is essentially that of the solitary ascidians, except that the viscera are somewhat differently disposed, the cavity being longer and narrower, and the entire animal, when viewed singly, more vermiform. (Owen.)

compound axle, s.

Mech.: One consisting of two parts joined by a sleeve or other locking device. [AXLE.] (Knight.)

compound battery, s.

Elect.: A voltaic battery, consisting of several pairs of plates, which develop a cumulative effect. [GALVANIC BATTERY.] (Knight.)

† compound corymb, s.

Bot. (Of inflorescence): The same as FASCICLE (q.v.).

compound division, s. [DIVISION.]

compound eyes, s. pl.

1. Entom.: Two large eyes possessed by insects, besides which they may also have simple eyes, as may be seen in the bee, &c. The compound eyes consist of numerous hexagonal facets, the lenses of which combine the characters of both crystalline and vitreous humours. OF A FLY. The house-fly has 4,000 such facets; the dragon-fly 12,000; and the little Mordella beetles 25,000.

2. Zool.: The higher Crustacea have eyes somewhat resembling those of insects.

compound flowers, a pl.

1. Gen.: Any kind of inflorescence in which there are florets surrounded by an involucre.

2. Spec.: The flower heads of Composite. They are small flowers collected into a head, fixed in a depressed axis, and surrounded by an involucre of floral leaves or bracts. To the unbotanical eye, some of them, the daisy for instance, look like simple flowers, but what are taken for the white or pink-tipped white petals are the florets of the ray, and what are held to be the stamens and pistils are the florets of the disk. [COMPOSITE.]

compound fraction, s. [FRACTION.]

compound fracture, s.

Surgery: 1. A fracture in which a bone is broken in more parts than one, or in which two bones joined together, as, for instance, the radius and the ulna, are both broken.

2. A fracture in which the external integuments are penetrated by the end of the fractured bone, as distinguished from one in which the bone only is broken, the surrounding parts sustaining no injury.

compound householder, s.

Law, Suffrage, &c.: A householder whose landlord by agreement pays the rates for him, under the Small Tenements Act of 1851. Under the Reform Act of 1867, a great diversity of opinion existed on the subject. It was decided that the compound householder should not have a vote; but by Goschen's Rating Assessment Act of 1869, a vote was conferred on him.

compound interest, s. [INTEREST.]

compound intervals, s. pl.

Music: Intervals greater than an octave, as opposed to simple intervals, which are less than an octave.

compound larceny, s.

Law: Such as has all the properties of simple larceny, but is accompanied with either one or both of the aggravations of a taking from one's house or person. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 17.)

compound leaf, s.

Botany: 1. A leaf in which the petiole branches, each branch terminating in a perfect leaf, generally called a leaflet.

2. A leaf, the divisions of which are articulated with the petiole. This latter definition is by many considered better than the former one, as with it simple and compound leaves rarely exist in the same natural assemblage, while if definition 1 be adopted the leaf of the orange is a winged simple leaf, but if 2 be preferred it is, as theoretically it ought to be, a compound one.

compound membranes, s. pl. (For definition see extract.)

"Under the title compound membranes we include those expansions which form the external integument of the body and are continued into the various internal passages which, by their involutions, contribute to form the various secreting organs or glands... they constitute the skin and mucous membranes, with the various glandular organs which open upon their surface. Hairs and nails, being hardened cuticle, are justly regarded as appendages to the former."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. 1, p. 47.

compound microscope, s.

Micros.: A microscope made up of a combination of lenses arranged in a tube. [MICROSCOPE.]

boil, boy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing, -ian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, sious, -cious = shüs. -hle, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

compound motion, s. [Motion.]

compound numbers, s. pl.

Algebra: Such numbers as can be divided by some other number besides unity without leaving a remainder, as 12, which can be divided by 2, 3, 4, and 6.

compound pier, s. A clustered column.

compound polype, s.

Zool.: A polype consisting of a multitude of individuals associated together into a single organism, what may be called the young, produced by gemination, remaining adherent to the parent, very much as branches remain connected with the trunk of the tree which sent them forth. The Sertularia, the Flustra, the Corals which form reefs, &c., belong to this division of zoophytes. (Owen, &c.) compound quantities, s. pl.

1. Algebra: Such quantities as are joined by the signs + or - , or are expressed by more letters than one.

2. Arith.: Quantities consisting of more denominations than one, as pounds, shillings, and pence; pounds, ounces, &c., whence the several operations of division, subtraction, &c., of such quantities are known as compound division, compound subtraction, &c.

compound radical, s.

Chem.: A radical which operates as if it were but single, while analysis shows it to be really composed of two. Example, Cyanogen.

compound rail, s.

Engin.: A rail made of several portions with a longitudinal joint, avoiding the transverse joint across the rail whereby the jarring is occasioned; a continuous rail. Also applied to several forms of rails which consist of a number of portions bolted or keyed together. (Knight.) compound ratio, s. The ratio of the product of the antecedents of two or more ratios to the product of the consequents: thus if 3 : 6 :: 4 : 12, then 12 : 72 is the compound ratio.

compound rest, s.

Mech.: The tool-carrier of an engine-lathe, moved longitudinally (along the work) by the leading-screw, actuated by the feed; and transversely (to or from the work), by its own feed-screw. (Knight.) compound screw, s.

Mech.: Two or more screws on the same axis. When the pitch of the respective screws varies, it forms a differential screw; when they run in different directions, it is a right and left screw.

compound spike, s.

Bot. (Of inflorescence): A spike consisting of small secondary spikelets.

compound spirits, s. pl. Rectified spirits to which has been added one or more flavouring ingredients. They are called also compounds. The chief compounds are gin, British brandy, and British rum. Cordials and liqueurs, such as curaçoa, lovage, cherry brandy, Noyeau, rum shrub, &c., are also denominated compounds. These are prepared by adding to clear rectified spirit various essences or oils, and sweetening with sugar or syrup. Sweetened compounds usually contain from 20 to 35 per cent. of proof spirit. (W. Harkness, F.C.S.) compound steam-engine, s.

Mech.: A form of steam-engine originally patented by Hornblower in 1781, in which steam at a relatively greater pressure was allowed to expand to a small cylinder, and then, escaping into a larger cylinder, to expand itself against a larger piston. Compound engines are of two classes, which may be called combined and independent compound engines. The former are those in which the cylinders are near each other, and the pistons commence their respective strokes simultaneously or nearly so, the steam expanding from one cylinder direct to the other through a small passage as convenient. To this class belong most land engines, and the compound marine with cranks at about 130°.

compound stops, s. pl.

Music: Organ stops having more than one rank of pipes. (Stainer & Barrett.) compound times, s. pl.

Music: Times in which the bar is divided into two or more groups of notes, e.g.,  $\frac{3}{4}$ , which consists of two groups of three notes;  $\frac{6}{8}$ , which consists of three groups of three notes, &c. Compound times are classified as duple or triple, according to the number of groups in each bar, not according to the number of notes in each group; e.g.,  $\frac{6}{8}$  is a duple time,  $\frac{9}{8}$  a triple time,  $\frac{12}{8}$  (four groups of three) a duple time, &c. The principal accent falls on the first note in each bar, and a subordinate accent on the first note of each group.

compound umbel, s.

Bot. (Of inflorescence): A kind of inflorescence in which the umbel divides into two or more smaller umbels, as in Heracleum. The umbel thus dividing is called the universal one, and the others the partial umbels.

compound word, s.

Gram.: A word composed of two or more words, according to certain rules.

cōm-pōund (2), s. [Etym. doubtful; a corruption of Port. campanha = a yard, a court, or, more probably, of Malay campung = an inclosure.] A term applied in India to the yard or enclosed space surrounding a dwelling.

¶ Comprehension Scheme:

Hist.: A scheme for comprehending within the English Church the Puritan as well as the Anglican party. An effort was made in this direction in 1689. A bill for altering some points in the liturgy to which exception was taken by the Nonconformists passed the House of Lords in 1689. But Convocation, when summoned at the instance of the House of Commons to discuss the scheme, ended by rejecting it. An attempt of the same kind made in Scotland in 1673 had been equally unsuccessful.

côm-prê-hên-sive, a. [Fr. compréhensif, as if from a Lat. comprehensivus, from comprehensus, pa. par. of comprehendo.]

1. Extending widely; including or comprehending many things; extensive, wide, compendious.

"Reverend and wise, whose comprehensive view At once the present and the future knew."

2. Having the power of grasping many things with the understanding; quick, acute, sharp of intellect.

"In truth, he united all the qualities of a great judge, an intellect comprehensive, quick and acute."
...—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

¶ Crsbb thus discriminates between comprehensive and extensive: "Comprehensive respects quantity, extensive regards space; that is comprehensive that comprehends much, that is extensive that extends into a wide field; a comprehensive view of a subject includes all branches of it; an extensive view of a subject enters into minute details: the comprehensive is associated with the concise; the extensive with the diffuse; it requires a capacious mind to take a comprehensive survey of any subject; it is possible for a superficial thinker to enter very extensively into some parts, while he passes over others. Comprehensive is employed only with regard to intellectual objects; extensive is used both in the proper or the improper sense: the signification of a word is comprehensive, or that powers of the mind are comprehensive: a plain is extensive, or a field of inquiry is extensive." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côm-prê-hên-sive-ly, adv. [Eng. comprehensively]; -ly.] In a comprehensive manner; widely, extensively, compendiously.

2. Extent, wideness of range and significance.

*côm-prê-hên-sôr, s. [Lat., from comprehensus, pa. par. of comprehendo.]

Old Divinity: One who is proficient, or who has attained to a full and perfect knowledge of the truth.

"... thou art yet a traveller, they [the saints in heaven] comprehensors . . ."—Bp. Hall: Soul's Farewell to Earth.

*com-prend, v. [See Def.] An old variant of comprehend (q.v.). (Chaucer.)

*côm-prêg-by-têr, s. [Pref. com = with, together, and Eng. presbyter (q.v.).] One who is joined or associated with others in office as a presbyter; a fellow-priest.

"Cyprian in many places . . . speaking of presbyters, calls them his compresbyters."—Milton: Of Reformation, bk. I.

*côm-prêg-by-têr-i-âl, a. [Eng. compresbyter; -i-âl.] Of or pertaining to a compresbyter; common to any priest with others.

côm-prêss, v.t. [From Low Lat. compresso = oppress: com = cum = with, and presso = to press, from pressus, pa. par. of premo = to press. Or from pref. com = with, together, and Eng. press (q.v.) (Skeat). Sp. comprimir; Ital. comprimere.]

I. Lit.: To squeeze or press together material things; to force, press, or drive into a narrow compass; to bring within smaller limits.

II. Figuratively:

1. To reduce or bring within narrower limits, to narrow. (Of immaterial things.)

"And his whole figure breathed intelligence Time had compress'd the freshness of his cheek Into a narrower circle of deep red."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. I.

*2. To have carnal intercourse with, to embrace.

*3. To restrain, to keep down.
"The adverse winds in leathern bags he braç'd, Compress'd their force."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, bk. x., l. 19, 20.

4. To reduce within narrower limits, to abridge, to make concise. (Applied to language, writings, &c.)

"The same strength of expression, though more compress'd, runs through his historical harangues."
...—Melmoth: Pilgr., bk. I, Let. 14.

*5. To reduce.
"Compress the sum into its solid worth."
Cooper: Conversation, 2d.

côm-prêss, s. [Fr. Compressage.]

1. Surg.: A pad of folded soft linen, used with a bandage to preserve a due pressure on a wound.

"I applied an intercloth at the ankle and upper part of the foot, and by compress and bandage dress'd it up."—Wisean.

2. Mach.: A machine for re-pressing cotton bales.

côm-prêssed, côm-prest, pt. par. or a. [COMPRESS, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Pressed together, condensed, narrowed.

II. Bot. (Of a seed): Flattened lengthwise, as distinguished from depressed, which means flattened vertically. The legume of the garden pea is compress'd.

compress'd-air, a. & s.

Compress'd-air Engine:

Mech.: An engine driven by the elastic force of compressed air. Its construction is usually like that of a steam-engine, the force of the expanding air being exerted against a piston in a cylinder. (Knicht.)

côm-prêss-si-bil-i-tÿ, s. [Eng. compressibility; -ity.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The quality or condition of being compressible; capability of compression.

2. Nat. Phil.: The property in virtue of which the volume of a body may be diminished by pressure. It is produced by its porosity. The most compressible bodies are gases, which may be reduced in this way to 10, 20, or even 100 times as little space as they previously occupied. If, however, very great pressure be applied, the tendency is for the gas to become fluid. Liquids were long thought to be incompressible, which is not accurate. Solids vary greatly in compressibility; india-rubber, cork, ivory balls, &c., are very compressible. (Ganot.)

côm-prêss-si-ble, a. [Fr. compressible.]

Capable of being compressed or forced into a narrower compass, or within narrower limits; admitting of compression.

"It is light, porous, compressible."—Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. viii., p. 113.

*côm-prêss-si-ble-nêss, s. [Eng. compressibility; -ness.] The same as COMPRESSIBILITY (q.v.).

côm-prêss-sing, pr. par., a., & s. [COMPRESS, v.]

A. As pr. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adj.: Having the quality or power of forcing into narrower spaces or limits

"In all cases the distortion is such as required for its production a compressing force acting at right angles to the planes of cleavage."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), xiv. 412.

C. As subst.: The act or process of exercising compression; compression.

compressing-machine, s. A machine for making compressed bullets. (Knicht.)

côm-prê-ssion (ssion as shôn), s. [Lat. compressio, from compressus, pa. par. of comprimo.]

1. Lit.: The act of compressing or forcing into a narrower compass, or within narrower limits.

2. Fig.: The condensation or compressing of language or thought.

"Involution of argument and compression of thought."—Idler, No. 76.

compression-casting, s. A mode of casting bronzes, &c., in moulds of potters' clay under a pressure which causes the metal to flow into the delicate tracery left by the pattern. The work approaches nearly the work of the graver and chisel. It is especially used in casting house-builders' hardware, letters and numbers for houses, stamps, &c. (Knicht.)

compression-cook, s. One containing an india-rubber tube which collapses on the pressure of the end of a screw-plug turned by the key. (Knicht.)

côm-prêss-sive, a. [Fr. compressif.]

*1. Forced, compulsory.

"Considering the brushiness and angulosity of the parts of the air, a more than ordinary motion or compressive rest may very well prove painful to the soul, and disharmonious to her touch."—More: Immortality of the Soul, bk. III, ch. I.

†2. Having the power or quality of compressing.

"... and whereunto all the blood of the body by the compressive motion of the veins, doth naturally tend, as to its ultimate hold."—Smith: Portraiture of Old Age, p. 236.

côm-prêss-sôr, s. [Mod. Lat., from Class. Lat. compressus, pa. par. of comprimo = to compress.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who, or that which compresses.

II. Technically:

1. Surg.: An instrument to compress the femoral artery; a substitute for a tourniquet.

2. Nautical:

(1) A lever arm to press on the chain-cable and keep it from veering away too fast.

(2) A device for compressing a gun-carriage to its alide or platform during recoil; the carriage is again set free for running up. (Knicht.)

3. Microscopy: A device to flatten microscopic objects under examination, in order to make out their structure; a compressorium. Compressors for the microscope are of various kinds; as, lever, reversible cell, parallel plate, Wenham's, &c. Sometimes a little box is constructed for the purpose, or by the handle of a mounted needle pressure may be applied to the thin glass covering the object to be compressed.

4. Pneumatics: A machine for compressing air. See AIR-PUMP, COMPRESS'D-AIR ENGINE, AIR-COMPRESSING MACHINE.

5. Anat.: That which compresses anything. Thus there are a Compressor hemisphaerium bulbi, and a compressor naris. Where there are more than one the pl. compressores is used.

côm-prêss-sôr-i-ûm, s. [Mod. Lat.] The same as COMPRESSOR II, 3 (q.v.).

"... to steep it in weak acetic acid, and then to thin it out under the compressorium."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. vii., p. 168.

bôil, bôÿ; pôit, jôwî; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -cian, tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -sious, -cious = shü. -ble, -dle, &c. = bël, dël.

com-près-sûre, s. [Pref. com = together, and pressure (q.v.).] The act of compressing; compression, pressure. (Dict. Gen.)

*com-priest, s. [Pref. com = together, and priest (q.v.).] A fellow-priest. " . . . deferring to chastise his lewd and insolent com-priests."—Milton: Apol. for Smectymnua.

*com-prim-it, v.t. [Lat. comprimo = to press together.] To subdue, to restrain, to keep down. "Hee is a physician to other men's affections, as to his own, by com-priming such passions as runne into an insurrection."—Ford: Line of Life (1630).

com-pris-al, s. [Eng. compris(e); -al.] 1. The act or process of comprising. 2. An epitome, compendium, or summary. "Slandering is a compilation, a comprisal and sum of all wickedness."—Barrow: Sermon, l. 254.

com-prise * com-prise, v.t. [Fr. compris, pa. par. of comprendre = to comprehend (q.v.)] I. Ordinary Language: 1. Lit.: To embrace, to contain, to include, to comprehend. " . . . and so on down to the sixth or seventh, which comprise the smallest stars visible to the naked eye."—Herschel: Astron. (5th ed., 1833), § 773. 2. Fig.: To plot, to plan, to contrive. " . . . there was done a cruel justice to the city of Burdeaux, done and comprised by Sir Thomas Pelton."—Berners: Froissart's Chronicle, vol. I, ch. 318. II. Scotch Law: To attach the estate of another for debt. "Cause the said cattell to be comprised."—Skene: Reg. Majest., p. 87. ¶ Crabb thus discriminates between comprise, to comprehend, to contain, to embrace, and to include: "Persons or things comprise or include; things only comprehend, embrace, and contain; a person comprises a certain quantity of matter within a given space; he includes one thing within another: an author comprises his work within a certain number of volumes, and includes in it a variety of interesting particulars. When things are spoken of, comprise, comprehend, and embrace have regard to the aggregate value, quantity, or extent; include or contain to the individual thing which forms a part. Comprise and contain are used either in the proper or the figurative sense; comprehend, embrace, and include, in the figurative sense only: a stock comprises a variety of articles; a library comprises a variety of books; the whole is comprised within a small compass: rules comprehend a number of particulars; laws comprehend a number of cases; countries comprehend a certain number of districts or divisions; terms comprehend a certain meaning; a discourse embraces a variety of topics; a plan, project, scheme, or system, embraces a variety of objects: a house contains a number of persons; a city contains a number of houses; a book contains much useful matter; a society contains very many individuals; it includes none but of a certain class." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

com-pris-ed (Eng.), * com-prys-it (Scotch), pa. par. or a. [COMPRIS, v.]

com-pris-ér, * com-prys-er, * com-prys-our, s. [Eng. compris(e); -er.] 1. Ord. Lang.: One who comprises. 2. Scotch Law: One who attaches the estate of another for debt. "Theirby the comprys-er has right to the millis, dewties, and profittes of the landis."—Acts Ja. VI. (ed. 1814), p. 679.

com-pris-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [COMPRIS, v.] A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

° 2. To be or remain hidden or secret.

"The thing wot conceal."—Ferrier: Marriage (1818), vol. II, p. 214.

° (2) Hia thus discriminates between to conceal, to hide, and to secrete: "Concealing has simply the idea of not letting come to observation; hiding that of putting under cover; secreting that of setting at a distance or in unfrequented places. Whatever is not seen is concealed, but whatever is hidden or secreted is intentionally put out of sight; a person conceals himself behind a hedge; he hides his treasures in the earth; he secretes what he has stolen under his cloak. Conceal is more general than either hide or secrete: all things are concealed which are hidden or secreted, but are not always hidden or secreted when they are concealed. Both mental and corporeal objects are concealed; corporeal objects mostly and sometimes mental ones are hidden; corporeal objects only are secreted; we conceal in the mind whatever we do not make known; that is hidden which may not be discovered or cannot be discerned; that is secreted which may not be seen. Facts are concealed, truths are hidden, goods are secreted." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

° cōn-cēal-a-ble, a. [Eng. conceal; -able.] Capable of being concealed, hidden, or kept close or secret. (Brownes: Vulgar Er., bk. I, ch. II.)

*cōn-çeale, v.t. [CONCEAL, v.] To conciliate, to reconcile.

"Thus man to God, earth to conceale to heaven / In time's full term, by him the Sonne was given." Moss: True Crucifixion, p. 18.

cōn-çealed, pa. par. or a. [CONCEAL, v.]

¶ Concealed Lands: Lands which had been concealed from the commissioners for the dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII.

"Concealers are such as finde out lands concealed, that is, such lands as are secretly delined from the King by common persons, having nothing to shew for them."—Les Termes de la Ley.

*cōn-çeal-ēd-lý, adv. [Eng. concealed; -ly.] In a secret or concealed manner; secretly, not openly. (Moss.)

*cōn-çeal-ēd-nēss, s. [Eng. concealed; -ness.] The quality or state of being concealed or hidden; secrecy, privacy.

cōn-çeal-ēr, s. [Eng. conceal; -er.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who or that which conceals or keeps secret.

*2. Old Law: One who gave information respecting "concealed lands" or "concealments;" an informer.

"By the others she restrained a most ravenous sort of men, whom they call concealers, by revoking their commission, and forcing them to restore what they had taken. For these concealers, being appointed to inquire whether any lands belonging to the Crown were concealed by private men, had begun, with scrupulous avarice, to seize upon lands given in times past by our devout fore-fathers to parish churches and hospitals; as also upon bells and the leaden roofs of churches."—C Camden: History of Elizabeth, bk. I, p. 136 (1658).

*cōn-çeal-ēr-ēss, *cōn-çeal-ēr-ēsse, s. [Eng. concealer; -ess.] A woman that conceals or hides.

1. The act of hiding, concealing, or keeping close.

"Few own such sentiments; yet this concealment derives rather from the fear of man than of any being above."—Glanville.

2. The state of being concealed or hidden; secrecy, privacy.

"If you know aught which does behove my knowledge thereof to be inform'd, imprison it not in ignorant concealment." Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, I. 2.

3. A hiding-place, or place where anything is kept out of sight or secret; a retreat, cover, or shelter.

"Commit their feeble offspring; the delf tree Offers its kind concealment to a fav." Thomson: Spring.

*4. Secret knowledge; mystery.

"Exceedingly well read, and profited In strange concealments." Shakesp.: 1 Henry IV., III. 1.

II. Law:

1. A suppression, or keeping back of matters material to the issue.

*2. The holding of land against the king's rights, by a person without proper title.

¶ Crabb thus distinguishes between concealment and secrecy:—"Concealment has to do with what concerns others; secrecy with that which concerns ourselves: what is concealed is kept from the observation of others; what is secret is known only to ourselves: there may frequently be concealment without secrecy, although there cannot be secrecy without concealment: concealment is frequently practised to the detriment of others; secrecy is always adopted for our own advantage or gratification: concealment is serviceable in the commission of crimes; secrecy in the execution of schemes: many crimes are committed with impunity when the perpetrators are protected by concealment; the best concerted plans are often frustrated for want of observing secrecy."

cōn-çode, v.t. & i. [Lat. concedo: con = cum = with, together; cedo = to yield.]

A. Transitive:

1. To yield, to give up, to surrender.

"The first is, petitio principii, which fallacie is committed, where that is assumed as a principle, to prove another thing, which is not conceded as true itself."—Brown: Vulgar Errors, bk. I, ch. iv.

2. To admit, to grant, to allow to pass undisputed.

"If this be conceded—and I do not see how Mr. Mosley can avoid the concession—it destroys the necessity of inferring Christ's divinity from his miracles."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), III. 53.

B. Intransitive:

I. To concede, to admit, to allow.

"We concede that self-love is the strongest and most natural love of man . . ."—Hewitt: Serm. (1856), p. 98.

*2. To give way, to make concessions.

" . . . I wished you to concede to America, at a time when she prayed concession at our feet."—Burke: Speech at Bristol previous to the Election.

 "Thel conceperien that bi this schulde Crist fully bede hym."
Wycliffe: Select Works, I. 29.
 ¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to conceive, to apprehend, to imagine, and to suppose: "Conceive, in the strict sense of the word, is the generic, the others the specific terms: since in apprehending, imagining, and supposing, we always conceive or form an idea, but not vice versa; the difference consists in the mode and object of the action: we conceive of things as proper or improper, and just or unjust, right or wrong, good or bad, this is an act of the judgment; we apprehend the meaning of another, this is by the power of simple perception, or of combination and reflection; we suppose or imagine that which has happened or may happen."
 He thus discriminates between to conceive to comprehend, and to understand: "Conception is the simplest operation of the three; when we conceive we may have but one idea, when we understand or comprehend we have all the ideas which the subject is capable of presenting. We cannot understand or comprehend without conceiving; but we may often conceive that which we neither understand nor comprehend. That which we cannot conceive is to us nothing; but the conception of it gives it an existence, at least in our minds; but understanding and comprehending is not essential to the belief of a thing's existence. So long as we have reasons sufficient to conceive a thing as possible or probable, it is not necessary either to understand or comprehend them in order to authorize our belief. The mysteries of our holy religion are objects of conception but not of comprehension. We conceive that a thing may be done without understanding how it is done; we conceive that a thing may exist without comprehending the nature of its existence. We conceive clearly, understand fully, comprehend minutely. Conception is a species of invention; it is the fruit of the mind's operation within itself. Understanding and comprehension are employed solely on external objects; we understand and comprehend that which actually exists before us, and presents itself to our observation. Conceiving is the office of the imagination, as well as the judgment; understanding and comprehension are the office of the reasoning faculties exclusively."

Crabb: Eng. Synon.

B. Chem.: A process which has for its object to increase the amount of a dissolved substance in a liquid, relatively to the quantity of the solvent, without adding any more of the dissolved substance itself. When the solvent is volatile this object is effected by evaporation, as when water, alcohol, or ether is expelled from a solution by heat, by exposure to the air, or in vacuo. If the dissolved substance is more volatile than the solvent, the concentration is effected by distillation, the more concentrated liquid being then found in the distillate, as in the rectification of hydrated alcohol and of volatile oils dissolved in water. In the case of aqueous liquids, concentration is sometimes effected by freezing out the water; in this manner a strong solution of salt may be obtained from sea water; strong spirit from vinous liquids, &c. A similar principle is applied to the separation of silver from lead. The argentiferous lead is melted and left to cool till about two-thirds of the mass is solidified. This consists of nearly pure lead, the portion which still remains liquid being an alloy richer in silver than the original mass. By repeating this operation several times the alloy at last becomes sufficiently rich in silver to be treated by cupellation. (Watts: Dict. Chem., vol. i., p. 1107.)

côn-cên-trâ-tive, a. [Eng. concentrat(e); -ive.]

1. Able to concentrate or fix the mind on one point or subject.

con-cep-ti-bil-i-ty, s. [Eng. conceptible; -ity.] The quality of being conceptible or conceivable.

"There is more of conceptibility and cognoscibility."—Cudworth: Intel. System, p. 68.

con-cep-ti-hle, a. [As if from a Lat. conceptibilis, from conceptus, pa. par. of concipio = to conceive.] Capable of being conceived, conceivable, intelligible.

"... most suitable and easily conceptible by us, because apparent in his works."—Bate: Origin of Manikind.

con-cep-tion, s. [Fr. conception; Sp. concepcion; Port. concepção; Ital. concezione; Prov. & Lat. conceptio, from conceptus, pa. par. of concipio = to conceive.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of conceiving.

(1) Lit.: The act or state of becoming quick with child. [I. 1.]

(2) Fig.: The first origin of anything.

"For all is perfect that God works on earth, And he that gives conception aids the birth."

Comper: Conception.

2. The state of being conceived. [Lit. & Fig.]

3. That which is conceived, [Fig. only.]

(1) Anything conceived in the mind; an idea, perception, purpose, thought. [I. 2.]

"... 'tis a thing impossible to frame Conceptions equal to the soul's desires."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

* (2) Concit, an affected sentiment.

II. Technically:

1. Phys.: The first formation of the embryo of an animal; the first animation of the ovum at the moment when it escapes from the ovarium, passing through the Fallopian tube to the uterus.

2. Mental Phil.:

(1) The cognition of classes, as distinguished from individuals; that special application of abstraction, comparison, and attention which elaborates what logicians call notions or concepts; the act of the mind in producing concepts or notions.

(2) The notions or concepts so produced; the "general" or "abstract ideas" of Locke; the "abstract general notions" of Hamilton. These are properly expressed by common terms, and constitute the object of study in pure or formal logic. The number of attributes embraced in a concept or notion constitutes its intension, comprehension, or logical content, and this determines its area or sphere of applicability, that is, its extension or logical extent. These two quantities exist in an inverse ratio to one another. The maximum of the extent of a conception or notion is the minimum of the content, and the maximum of the content is the minimum of the extent. On this single maxim Pure or Formal Logic has been based. [Kant, Sir Wm. Hamilton, Prof. Campbell Fraser, Edinburgh University.]

Dugald Stewart used conception as equivalent to reproductive imagination, and Reid used it as convertible with imagining, understanding, or comprehending.

"Imagining should not be confounded with conceiving, &c., though some philosophers, as Gassendi, have not attended to the distinction. The words conception, concept, notion, should be limited to what cannot be represented in the imagination, as the thought suggested by a general term. The Leibnitzians call this symbolical in contrast to intuitive knowledge. This is the sense in which conceptio and conceptus have been usually and correctly employed. Mr. Stewart, on the other hand, arbitrarily limits conception to the reproduction, in imagination, of an object of sense as actually perceived."—Sir Wm. Hamilton's Note on Reid, The Intellectual Powers, p. 260.

"The term conception, which means a taking up in bundles and grasping into unity, ought to have been left to denote, what it previously was and only properly could be, applied to express—the notions we have of classes of objects, in other words, what have been called our general ideas."—Sir Wm. Hamilton: Metaphysics, p. 262, vol. ii.

"... abstract conceptions are impossible."—Herbert Spencer (2nd ed.), vol. ii., p. 525, § 487.

3. Theol. & Ch. Hist.: [IMMACULATE].

con-cep-tion-ist, s. [Eng. conception; -ist.] A conceptionalist.

"The born conceptionists, the spiritual children of Aristotle."—Coleridge: Marginalia; quoted in Blackwood's Magazine, Jan., 1862, p. 123.

con-cep-tious, a. [Lat. conceptus; Eng. suff. -ious.] Apt or quick to conceive; pregnant, fruitful.

"... thy fertile and conceitious womb."—Shakep.: Timon of Athens, s.

con-cep-tive, a. [Lat. conceptus; Eng. suff. -ive.]

* 1. Lit.: Having the power or quality of conceiving, fruitful.

* 2. Fig.: Having the power or faculty of conceiving mentally.

"Now there is nothing in this process which necessarily eludes the conceptive or imagining power of the purely human mind."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), v. 117.

con-cep-tu-a-lism, s. [Lat. conceptus, and Eng. suff. -al; -ism.]

Metaph. & Hist.: The distinctive speculative opinion, or opinions, of the conceptualists.

"The close of all Albert the Great's intense labours, of his enormous assemblage of the opinions of the philosophers of all ages, and his efforts to harmonize them with the high Christian theology, is a kind of eclecticism, an unreconciled realism, conceptualism, nominalism, with many of the difficulties of each."—Münnan: Hist. of Lat. Christianity, bk. xiv., ch. iii.

Con-cep-tu-a-list, s. & a. [Eng. conceptual(ism); -ist.]

A. As substantive:

Metaph. & Hist. (pl.): A metaphysical sect— if, indeed, it had coherence enough to be called a sect—which arose in the Middle Ages during the disputes between the Nominalists and the Realists. It sought to occupy an intermediate position between the two contending parties, but it approximated much more nearly to the Nominalists than to the Realists; perhaps, indeed, it was not really distinct from the former. The Realists held that general ideas, such as genus, species, &c., called in the language of the schoolmen universals, are real existences, at least in the Divine mind; the Nominalists, on the contrary, contended that they were mere names or words, while the Conceptualists held that they were not only names but mental conceptions or ideas. The Conceptualists were not able to make their voice very audible in Medieval times amid the din of battle between the greater combatants, but the eminent metaphysician Locke held views essentially conceptualist.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to the tenets of the metaphysicians described under A.

"St. Thomas, like his predecessor, Albert, on the great question of universals, is eclectic; neither absolutely realist, conceptualist, nor nominalist."—Münnan: Hist. of Lat. Christianity, bk. xiv., ch. iii.

con-cep-tu-er, * con-cep-tu-er, v. t. & i. [Fr. concevner; Ital. conceverre; Sp. concevnr, from Lat. concerno = (1) to mix, to mingle; (2) to concern, to regard; con = cum = with; jerno to separate, to observe, to discriminate.]

"And keep in tune with heav'n, till God ere long To his celestial concert us unite."—Milton: Solemn Music.

II. Music: An entertainment in which a number of persons or instruments, or both, take part.

"A concert or consort of viols in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was a quartet or other number of stringed instruments performing in concert. (Grove.)

¶ Concerts of music to which the public are admitted by payment are of comparatively recent origin in the history of music. The advertisement of the first London concert runs as follows: "These are to give notice, that at Mr. John Barrister's house (now called the Musik School), over against the 'George' Tavern, in White Fryers, this present Monday, will be music performed by excellent masters, beginning precisely at 4 of the clock in the afternoon, and every afternoon for the future, precisely at the same hour."—London Gazette, Dec. 30th, 1672. (Stainer & Barrett.) The first concerts known to have taken place were performed at Vienna by the Filarmónico in 1555. There was a subscription concert at Oxford in 1665. The first in London was the one mentioned by Stainer and Barrett as taking place in 1672, but they did not become an institution of the metropolis till the rise of the Academy of Ancient Music in 1710. [ORATORIO.]

concert-pitch, s.

- "Conchifera [are] shell-fish; usually restricted to those with bivalve shells."—Owen: Comp. Anat., gloss.
2. Pl.: The English designation of the class Conchifera (q.v.).

conch'-if-ēr-a, s. [Lat. concha = a conch, i connective, and fero = to bear.]

1. Zool.: Lamarck's designation now generally adopted for the great class of Mollusca containing the species which possess ordinary bivalve shells. Cuvier arranged the Conchifera with Salpa and other naked molluscs into a class Acephala—i. e., Headless Animals—so called because they have no apparent head, but a mere mouth concealed in the bottom or between the folds of their mantle. He placed them in an order Acephala Teataca, distinguishing their shellless associates as Acephala Nuda. From their possessing four branchial lamellæ or leaflets, De Blainville called them Lamellibranchiata, a name still much in use; it is the designation Professor Huxley retains for the class. Their body is included within a mantle or pallium, formed by a prolongation of the dorsal integuments; there is a well-developed heart, generally with two auricles and one ventricle, or with one of each or even two of each. Some have a conspicuous foot. They have bivalve shells of the normal type, which as a rule have the right and left valves nearly of the same size and shape, and both more or less inequilateral, the anterior being much shorter than the posterior side. This distinguishes them from the Brachiopoda, in which the bivalve shells are as a rule unequal in size, but each singly equilateral. [BRACHIOPODA.] The valves of a Conchifer are bound together by an elastic ligament, and are jointed by a hinge furnished with interlocking teeth. Near each hinge is an umbo, i. e., a boss or beak, which was the point whence the growth of the shell originally took place. The length of a valve is measured from the anterior to the posterior side, its breadth from the dorsal margin to the base, its thickness from the centre of the closed valves. Bivalve shells are said to be shut when the valves fit exactly, and gaping when they cannot be completely shut; the outer side has often ribs radiating from the umbo to the margin or concentric ridges. Inside the margin of the shell on which the ligament and teeth are situated is the hinge-line. The adductor muscles, the foot and byssus, the siphons, and the mantle, all leave muscular impressions.

2. Palæont.: Fossil bivalves are found in most sedimentary rocks. They are somewhat rare in the earlier formations, but go on to increase through the Secondary and Tertiary Periods, reaching their maximum in the present seas. They are seven times more numerous in the Newer Tertiary than in the oldest geological systems. (S. F. Woodward.)

con'-chif-ēr-ous, a. [Lat. concha (q.v.), i connective, fero = to bear, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Bearing a shell. (Pen. Cycl.)

con'-chi-form, a. [Lat. concha (q.v.), and forma = form, shape.]

Bot.: Shaped like a single valve of a bivalve shell. (Treas. of Bot.)

† con'-chil'-i-ous, a. [CONCHYLIOUS.]

con'-chîn-ine, s. [An alteration in the relative positions of the letters constituting the word Cinchonine (q.v.).]

Chem.: Also called Quinidine,  $C_{20}H_{24}N_2O_2$ , an organic base isomeric with quinine, occurring in cinchona-bark. It crystallises in bitter colourless prisms, soluble in dilute sulphuric acid, the solution showing blue fluorescence, and its alcoholic solution giving a green colour with chlorine water and ammonia.

conch'-i-ô-lîn, s. [Gr. κόγχιον (kongchion), dim. of κόγχη (kongchê) = a muscle or a cockle; l euphonic, and suff. -in (Chem.)]

Chem.: An organic substance obtained from shells of molluscs by removing the calcium carbonate with hydrochloric acid. It is insoluble in water, and does not form gelatine when boiled with water. It contains 50 per cent. of carbon, 6 of hydrogen, and about 16 per cent. of nitrogen. By long boiling with dilute sulphuric acid it yields leucin.

* conch'-ite, s. [Fr. conchite; Gr. κόγχη (kongchê) = a conch (q.v.), and suff. -ite (Palæont.) (q.v.).] A fossil "conch," or similar shell. [CONCH.] The modern palæontologist does not need the term; he attempts, generally with success, to ascertain the genus and species of any fossil shell he may find, or, if it is new to science, give it a name.

conch'-it'-io, a. [Eng. conchit(e); -io.] Composed of or largely containing shells.

conch'-ô-dēr-ma, s. [Gr. κόγχη (kongchê) = a mussel or a cockle, and δέρμα (dërma) = skin.]

Zool.: A genus of Cirripedia, family Lepadidae. Conchoderma aurita of Darwin, Lepas aurita of Linnæus, is common in all seas, and is frequently met with on the bottom of ships returning to this country from abroad.

conch'-œ'-gl'-a, s. [Gr. κόγχη (kongchê) = a muscle or cockle; οἶκος (oîkos) = a house, and Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ia.]

Zool.: A genus of Entomostracans, the typical and only known one of the family Conchocæidæ (q.v.). Conchocæla obtusata La found in Shetland. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

conch'-œ'-gl'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. conchocæla, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Entomostracans, order Ostracoda. The inferior antennæ are four-branched, with one of the branches rudimentary, and immovable feet two pairs; posterior ones rudimentary; eyes none. [CONCHOCÆLIA.] (Griffith & Henfrey.)

conch'-ôid, s. [Ger., Fr., & Port. conchoïde; Gr. κογχοειδής (kongchoeidês) = of the mussel kind; κόγχη (kongchê) = a shell; and εἶδος (eîdos) = form.]

Geom.: A curve discovered by Nicomedes in the second century A.D., and used by him for the finding of two mean proportionals. If a straight line always passes through a fixed point o, and a point q, fixed into the revolving line, always moves along the line AB, then any point p in the revolving line always at the same distance from q will trace out a conchoid. And, since the length q p can in any position of the revolving line be measured either towards or from o, it is evident that, corresponding to any given length assigned to q p, two conchoids can be described, one above and the other below the line AB. These are known as the superior and inferior conchoids. Moreover, with a given point o and a given straight line AB, any number of pairs of different conchoids can be described by varying the length q p. Moreover, the shapes of all such curves will vary according to the length of q p. Thus, if q p is less than the perpendicular from o on AB, the shape is as given in the adjoining figure, and the laicist point o is also a point on the curve.

conch'-ôl'-dal, a. [Eng. conchoid; -al.]

Min.: Presenting a surface more or less like the surface of a shell. Used of the fracture of minerals when they so break as to present on one fragment a concave surface like that of the interior of a bivalve shell, and on the other a convex one, like its exterior. There are varieties of it—viz., imperfectly, and again perfectly, large, small, and fist conchoidal. (Phillips.)

conch'-ô-lôg'-i-cal, a. [Gr. κόγχη (kongchê) = a shell-fish; λόγος (logos) = a discourse; and Eng. suff. -ical (q.v.).] Relating to or in any way connected with conchology.

conch'-ôl'-ô-gist, s. [Eng. conchology]; -ist.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who studies or is versed in conchology.

2. Zool.: A name given to the carriershells, from their often attaching shells to the margins of their whorls as they grow. (Ogilvie.)

conch'-ôl'-ô-gy, s. [Gr. κόγχη (kongchê) = a muscle or cockle, and λόγος (logos) = a discourse.] The science of shells. Two well-marked stages in its development are traceable. At first shells were studied without any reference to the animals of which they constituted the hard framework or skeleton. Subsequently the study took a wider scope, and for the first time became worthy of being called a science, when the animals and their shells were viewed as parts of one common whole. When shells were looked upon as little more than ornamental objects, those who studied conchology were not generally of a high order of intellect; but since the rise of geology and the discovery that of all fossils shells are able to furnish the most definite information regarding the several strata, and consequently regarding the history of bygone times, scientific minds of the very first class have given keen attention to shells. Some of these belonging to land animals, others to those inhabiting fresh water, and the great majority to those which are marine, the fossil shells in a stratum constantly enable the geologist to ascertain whether a stratum is the remains of a land surface, or a deposit from fresh water, or the bed of a sea. Particular genera and species flourish at certain fixed depths, and when the geologist finds analogous fossil shells, he is able, startling as it may appear, within certain limits to sound the depths at particular spots of a primeval and now long departed sea.

When shells, and shells alone, were studied, conchology was a not unsuitable name, except that the termination -ology suggested that the investigation was more scientific than in most cases it really was. When the animals came to be carefully examined, M. de Blainville proposed for this deeper study the name Malacozology—i.e., the study of the softer animals—viz., Molluscs; this has been since abbreviated into Malacology. As each of the terms Conchology and Malacology refers to only half the inquiry, we have avoided both, and, unless in exceptional cases, described Mollusca and their shells under the heading Zoology.

† cōnch-ōm'-ēt-ēr, s. [Gr. κόγχη (kongchē) = . . . a shell, and μέτρον (metron) = a measure.] An instrument for measuring shells.

• cōnch-ōns, s. [CONSCIENCE.] (Halliwell.)

cōnch-ō-spir'-al, a. [Eng. conch, o connective, and spirul.] Spiral as a univalve shell.

cōnch-ō-ūs, s. [Gr. κόγχη (kongchē).] [CONCH.] Anatomy:

- 1. The cranium.
- 2. The cavity or socket of the eye.

† cōnch-ō-yl'-ā-ō-ōūs, cōnch-ō-yl'-ī-ā-ō-ōūs, a. [From Lat. conchylium; Gr. κογχύλιον (kongchulion) = (1) a mussel or cockle, (2) any bivalve shell; dimin. of κογχύλη (kongchulē) = the shell called murex (q.v.).] Pertaining to shells, resembling shells.

† cōnch-ō-yl'-ī-ōl'-ō-gīst, s. [Fr. conchyliologiste.] The same as CONCHOLOGIST (q.v.).

† cōnch-ō-yl'-ī-ōl'-ō-gy, s. [Fr. conchyliologie.] The same as CONCHOLOGY (q.v.).

cōnch-ō-yl'-ōm'-ē-tr'y, s. [Gr. κογχύλιον (kongchulion) [CONCHYLIOSEOUS]; and μέτρον (metron) = a measure.] The measurement of shells, and specially of their curves.

† cōnch-ō-yl'-ī-ōūs, † cōnch-ō-yl'-ī-ōūs, a. [From Lat. conchylium; Gr. κογχύλιον (kongchulion), and Eng. snff. -ous.] Pertaining to shells. (Smart.)

cōn-ōl'-ā-tōr, s. [Ital. conciliatore, from conciare = to adjust, to regulate, from Lat. comatus = neat, pa. par. of como = to dress, to comb; Low Lat. concio = (1) to adorn, (2) to adjust accounts.]

Glass-making: The person who weighs and proportions the salt on ashes and sand, and who works and tempers them. (Webster.)

cōn-ōl'-ērgē, s. [Fr., from O. Fr. consierge, from Low Lat. consurgius: said to be con = cum = with, together; cerco, circo = to go round, from circum = round.] [SEARCH.]

- * 1. A keeper or governor of a fortress or castle.
- 2. A porter, a door-keeper, a janitor.

"He is known and re-known by the concierges, by the judges, by the greater part of the senate. . . ."—Sir G. Buck: Hist. of Rich III., p. 98.

• cōn-ōl'-ī-a-ble, a. [Lat. conciliabilis.] Capable of being reconciled or accorded with anything.

"Nor doth he put away audaciously who complains of cases rotd in immovable nature, utter unfitness, utter disconformity, not conciliable, because not to be amended without a miracle."—Milton: Tetrachordon.

• cōn-ōl'-ī-a-ble, * cōn-ōl'-ī-a-ble, s. [Fr. conciliable; Lat. conciliabulum, from conciliium = an assembly.] [COUNCIL.] A small or private religious meeting, a convective.

"Some have sought the truth in the convecticles and conciliables of heretics and sectaries. . . ."—Bacon: Of Controv. of the Ch. of England.

• cōn-ōl'-ī-ar, a. [Formed as if from a Lat. conciliaris, from conciliium = a council, a meeting.] Relating or pertaining to a council or meeting.

"In effect the emperor was president, though not as a judge in spiritual matters, yet as an orderer of the conciliar transactions."—Barrow: Of the Pope's Supremacy.

* cōn-ōl'-ī-ar-ly, adv. [Eng. conciliar; -ly.] By or in accordance with a council. (Barrow.)

• cōn-ōl'-ī-ar-y, a. [Eng. conciliar; -y.] Pertaining to or issued by a council or general assembly.

"By their authority the conciliary definitions passed into law."—Jeremy Taylor: Ductor Dubitantium, ii. 205.

cōn-ōl'-ī-āte, v.t. [Lat. conciliatus, pa. par. of concilio = to reconcile, to conciliate, from conciliium = an assembly, a union.] [COUNCIL.]

* 1. To assure, confirm, or make stronger.

"It is not long ago since some kings gave their daughters to foreign kings in marriage to conciliate amity. . . ."—Joye: Exposition of David, c. 11.

2. To win or gain over to one's side from a state of hostility or indifference; to win the regard or goodwill of.

"Her affability had conciliated many who had been repelled by his freezing looks and short answers."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xli.

† Crabb thus discriminates between conciliate and reconcile: "Conciliate and reconcile are both employed in the sense of uniting men's affections, but under different circumstances. The conciliator gets the good will and affections for himself; the reconciler unites the affections of two persons to each other. The conciliator may either gain new affections, or regain those which are lost; the reconciler always renews affections which have been once lost. The best means of conciliating esteem is by reconciling all that are at variance. Conciliate is mostly employed for men in public stations; reconcile is indifferently employed for those in public or private stations. Men in power have sometimes the happy opportunity of conciliating the good will of those who are most averse to their authority, and thus reconciling them to measures which would otherwise be odious. Kindness and condescension serve to conciliate; a friendly influence, or a well-timed exercise of authority, is often successfully exerted in reconciling." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōn-ōl'-ī-ā-tēd, pa. par. of a. [CONCILIATE, v.]

cōn-ōl'-ī-āt-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONCILIATE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adj.: Gaining over to one's side; winning, conciliatory, of engaging manners.

" . . . the more plant and conciliating method of Cleero."—Hurd: On Sincerity in the Commercial World, dial 1.

C. As subst.: The act of gaining over to one's side; conciliation.

cōn-ōl'-ī-ā-tion, s. [Lat. conciliatio, from concilio = to conciliate.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of conciliating or gaining over to harmony or goodwill; reconciliation.

" . . . conciliation of some good between our said good brother and the French king."—Styrye: Memorials; Queen Mary, an. 1553.

2. The state of being conciliated or reconciled.

"The house has gone farther; it has declared conciliation admissible, previous to any submission on the part of America."—Burke: On Conciliation with America.

II. Law: By an Act passed on 15th August, 1867, Councils of Conciliation, to adjust differences between masters and their workmen, may be established by license of the Secretary of State. (Haydn.)

† cōn-ōl'-ī-ā-tive, a. [Eng. conciliate; -ive.] Tending to or having the power or property of conciliating; conciliatory. (Coleridge.)

cōn-ōl'-ī-ā-tōr, s. [Lat., from concilio = to conciliate, to reconcile.]

1. One who conciliates or makes peace between parties.

"He thought it would be his great honour to be the conciliator of Christendom."—Bishop Hacket: Life of Archbishop Williams, pt. 1, p. 103.

2. One who reconciles matters at variance or discrepancy.

cōn-ōl'-ī-ā-tōr-y, a. [Eng. conciliator; -y.] Tending to or having the effect of conciliating; friendly, reconciling.

"Ever Howe thought it advisable to hold conciliatory language."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxx.

• cōn-ōl'-nāte, a. [Lat. concinnatus, pa. par. of concinno = to make neat; concinnus = neat.] Neat, elegant, apt.

" . . . a mane of ripe judgement in elocution and choosing concinnate terms, and apt and eloquent words."—Hall: Henry VII., an. 5.

* cōn-ōl'-nāte, v.t. [CONCINNATE, a.] To refine, to mix properly.

"Cato setteth down a receipt to trim and concinnate wine . . ."—Boltand: Plinie, bk. xiv., ch. 20.

* cōn-ōl'-nā-tion, a. [Lat. concinnatio = a making neat; concinnus = neat.] A making neat, decent, or perfect.

" . . . the building, concinnation, and perfecting of the saints."—Bishop Reynolds: On the Passions, p. 17.

• cōn-ōl'-cīna, a. [Lat. concinnus.] Neat, elegant, becoming.

"Beauty consists in a sweet variety of colour, and in a concinne disposition of different parts."—Adams: Works, i. 303.

cōn-ōl'-nī-t'y, * cōn-ōl'-nī-tie, s. [Lat. concinnatus = neatness, from concinnus = neat.] Neatness, fitness, harmony of parts. Used—

1. Of speech, language, &c.:

"Cleero, who supposed figures to be named of the Grecian schemates, called them concinnitie, that is, progress, aptness, fitness, also conformations, forms, and fashions; comprising all ornaments of speech under one name."—Peacham: Garden of Eloquence, bk. i. (1577).

2. Of a building:

"The college call'd Amarodoeh in Fes—which has been so amply celebrated for the concinnity of its building."—L. Addison: Western Barbary, p. 133.

* cōn-ōl'-nois, a. [Lat. concinnus = neat.] Neat, becoming, agreeable, pleasant.

• cōn-ōl'on, * cōn-ōl'on, s. [Lat. concio: con = cum = with, together; cio = to call, to summon.]

1. A meeting, an assembly, a convocation.

"In public concion and in writing sealed."—Pope, &c.: Acta, p. 272.

2. An address made to an assembly.

"He committit both the pepill to comper to his concion."—Baleard: F. Lit., p. 160.

• cōn-ōl'on-ar-y, a. [Lat. concionarius.] The same as CONCIONATORY (q.v.).

• cōn-ōl'on-āte, v.t. [Lat. concionatus, pa. par. of concionor.] To preach.

• cōn-ōl'on-ā-tive, a. [Eng. concional(e); -ive.] Of or pertaining to preaching.

cōn-ōl'-ō-nā-tōr, s. [Lat. = a harsenger of the people, a demagogue, an agitator.]

- 1. A preacher.
- 2. A common councilman, a freeman. (Wharton.)

cōn-ōl'-ōn-a-tōr-y, a. [Lat. concionatorius, concionatorius.] Used in public assemblies or at preachings.

" . . . their concionatory invectives."—Howell.

• cōn-ōl'-ī-ōnt, a. [Lat. concipiens, pr. par. of concipio = to conceive.] Conceiving.

"By puff's concipient some in ether flit."—J. & H. Smith: Rejected Addresses, p. 140.

cōn-ōl'-ī-ōn, a. [Fr. concis (m.), concise (f.); Lat. concisus = cut short, brief, pa. par. of concido = to cut short, to abridge; con = cum = with, together; cido = to cut.] Short, brief, condensed, and comprehensive; terse, succinct, not diffuse (used of language, style, &c.).

" . . . the same Spartan, calmly dressing his hair, and uttering his concis jests. . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xli.

cōn-ōl'-ī-ōn-ly, adv. [Eng. concise; -ly.] In a concise manner or style; briefly, shortly, succinctly, tersely.

"Ulysses here speaks very concisely, and he may seem to break abruptly into the subject."—Broom: On the Odyssey.

cōn-ōl'-ī-ōn-ness, s. [Eng. concise; -ness.] The quality of being concise; brevity, terseness, succinctness.

" . . . the noble conciseness of those ancient legends . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

āte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; tr'y, S'yrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

con-cl'-sion, s. [Fr. & Sp. concision; Port. concisão; Ital. concisione; Prov. concisio. From Lat. concisionem, accus. of concisio (rhet.) = the separating of a clause into two divisions; concisus = divided, pa. par. of concido = to cut up, to cut to pieces, to destroy; con and cado = to cause to fall, to hew, to cut; cado = to fall.]

† 1. Of style: Conciseness.

2. Of sects, factions, or factious individuals:

(1) Scripture: The rendering given both in the Authorized and in the Revised versions of the New Testament to καταρῆσις (katarhêsîs) in Philip. iii. 2, a term contemptuously applied by St. Paul to the Judaizing teachers in the Philippian Church, who insisted on the necessity of the Christians, Jews and Gentiles, being circumcised. His argument is: The circumcision which they recommend you, having now lost its spiritual significance, I contemptuously call concision—i. e., a mangling of the body; we are the true circumcision, we have that of the heart and not that of the body.

(2) Fig.: A contemptuous term applied in controversy to schisms produced by dissatisfied persons in the Church. (South.)

con-cl'-tation, s. [Lat. concitatio, from concito = to disturb; con = cum = with, together; cito = to stir.] The act of stirring up, exciting, or setting in motion. (Brownie.)

con-cl'-tate, v.t. [Lat. concito = to disturb, to stir up.] To disturb, to stir up, to excite or set in motion. (Cotgrave.)

con-cl'-téd, pa. par. or a. [CONCITE.]

con-cl'-tîng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONCITE.] A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of disturbing, stirring up, or setting in motion; concitation.

con-cl'-tizen, s. [Pref. con and citizen (q.v.). In Fr. concitojen.] A fellow-citizen. "For what is it to me by whom I suffer evil of one and the same kind and degree, whether it be by a neighbour, or a stranger, or a foreigner or a con-citizen."—Anox: His. Reformation; Pref.

con-cla-má'-tion, s. [Lat. conclamatio, from conclamo = to cry out.] The act of shouting together; a united or general outcry or shout.

con-clave, s. [Fr., Sp., Port., & Ital. conclave; Prov. conclavi; Lat. conclave = a room, dining-hall, cabinet, closet, stall, or coop that may be locked up; con here the same as cum = with, and clavis = a key.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of places: The cells described under II.

2. Of persons:

(1) Lit.: The cardinals confined within such cells for the election of a pope.

"It was said of a cardinal, by reason of his apparent likelihood to step into St. Peter's chair, that in two conclaves he went in pope and came out again cardinal."—South: Sermon.

(2) Fig.: A close or secret assembly—

(a) Of men:

"If busy men In sober conclave met, to weave a web Of anxiety, whose living threads should stretch Beyond the seas, and to the farthest pole." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. III.

† (b) Of animals:

"Like wolves before the levin flame, When, 'mid their howling conclave driven, Hath glanced the thunderbolt of heaven." Scott: Rokeby, v. 33.

(c) Of the heathen gods:

"Forthwith a conclave of the godhead insets, Where Juno in the shining senate sits." Garth.

II. Eccles.: For the two senses in which the term conclave is used, see I. 1, 2. Pope Nicolas III., in the eleventh century, and Alexander III., in the twelfth, having limited the right of electing a pope to the college of cardinals, in 1268, on the death of Clement IV., the electors could not for nearly three years agree upon a successor; and in 1271 the magistrates, acting on the advice of St. Bonaventura, locked them up till they could agree, which confinement made them do before long. The success of the scheme led to its becoming a settled institution, and it still continues. The appropriate place for shutting up the cardinal electors is a range of small cells in the Vatican, or some other pontifical palace, though a conclave may be held elsewhere; thus Pius VII. was elected at Venice. Formerly the practice was to limit the electors to a single dish at dinner and the same at supper if they did not agree within three days, and to a small allowance of bread, water, and wine, if the eighth day saw their deliberations still uncompleted. Gregory XV. regulated the conclave by a bull issued in 1621, and Urban VI. by one sent forth in 1625.

con-clá'-vist, s. [Fr. conclaviste; Ital. & Mod. Lat. conclavista.]

Eccles.: An ecclesiastic acting as secretary and servant to a cardinal, and shut up with him in the same building during the time that the conclave continues.

* con-clím'-ate, v.t. [Pref. con, and climate (q.v.).] To lazure or accustom to a climate; to acclimatize.

con-clúde', * con-clúd-en, v.t. & i. [Lat. concludo = to shut up together; con = cum = with, together; claudo = to shut; Fr. conclure; Ital. concludere; Sp. & Port. concluir.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To shut up or in, to enclose.

"The very person of Christ therefore, for ever and the self-same, was only, touching bodily substance, concluded within the grave."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, bk. v., § 82.

2. To end, to terminate, to finish, to close.

"And shortly to conclude all his wo." Chaucer: C. T., l. 1380.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. To include, to comprehend, to embrace.

"God hath concluded them all in unbelief, . . ."—Romans xi. 32.

2. To determine, to arrange, to settle.

"He never refused to be concluded by the authority of one legally summoned."—Atterbury. Q. Etsi. It is determined, not concluded yet." Shakspeare: Richard III., l. 2.

* 3. To oblige, to bind down.

"He never refused to be concluded by the authority of one legally summoned."—Atterbury.

* 4. To hinder, to obstruct.

"This open thing which is befalle Concludeth him by such a way." Gower: l. 188.

* 5. To gather as a consequence from reasoning; to infer, to come to a conclusion as to anything; to reckon.

" . . . no man can conclude God's love or hatred to any person, by any thing that befalls him."—Archbishop Tillotson.

* 6. To refute, confute, or convince by argument.

"In all those temptations Christ concluded the fiend."—Foxe: Acts, &c., p. 602.

* 7. To prove, to demonstrate.

" . . . in the end as it shall appear, he concludeth nothing."—Jewell: Reply to M. Harding, p. 496.

* 8. To decide, to consider as proved.

"But no frail man, however great or high, Can be concluded blent before he die." Addison: Ovid.

* 9. To acknowledge as true or correct, to admit.

"Reprove my allegation, if you can; Or else conclude my words effectual." Shakspeare: 2 Henry VI., III. 1.

10. Law: To prevent from. (Wharton.)

* B. Reflexive: To preclude, to shut out.

C. Intransitive:

1. To finish, to make an end, to come to a conclusion.

" . . . and so her death concludes." Shakspeare: 1 Henry VI., v. 4.

2. To leave off speaking or writing.

¶ To conclude: In short, in fine; to be brief.

" . . . and, to conclude, they are lying knaves."—Shakspeare: Much Ado, v. 1.

3. To determine, to come to a decision, to make up one's mind.

"I will conclude to hate her, . . ." Shakspeare: Cymbel., III. 5.

* 4. To come to a decision or determination; to arrange, to decide, to agree.

" . . . conclude and be agreed." Shakspeare: Rich. II., l. 1.

¶ Sometimes followed by the prep. on.

"Buckford concluded on the articles." Shakspeare: 2 Henry VI., l. 1.

5. To collect by reasoning, to gather, to infer.

" . . . the world will conclude I had a guilty conscience."—Arbuthnot: History of John Bull.

* 6. To form an opinion or decision (with of or upon).

"Can we conclude upon Luther's instability, . . ."—Atterbury.

¶ For the difference between to conclude and to close, see CLOSE; for that between to conclude upon and to decide, see DECIDE.

con-clá'-déd, pa. par. or a. [CONCLUDE.]

* con-clá'-dence, * con-clá'-den-gý, s. [Lat. concludens, pr. par. of concludo.] A logical deduction, consequence, or inference; a conclusion. (Hale.)

* con-clá'-sí-ble, a. [Lat. conclusus, pa. par. of concludo = to conclude.] Admitting of proof; determinable; capable of being inferred or demonstrated.

"'Tis as certainly concludible from God's presence, . . ."—Hammond.

con-clá'-sion, * con-clu-ci-oun, * con-clu-si-oun, * con-clu-sy-on, s. [Fr. conclusion; Ital. conclusione; Sp. conclusion, from Lat. conclusio, from conclusus, pa. par. of concludo.] [CONCLUDE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The end, finish, close, termination, or last part.

"A tale that in conclusion saith . . ." Gower: l. 23.

"The conclusion shall be crowned with your enjoying her."—Shakspeare: Merry Wives, III. 5.

2. A final decision or determination.

"Ways of peaceable conclusion there are but these two certain . . ."—Hooker.

3. An inference or deduction; a judgment or opinion.

"Then doth the wit Build fond conclusions on those idle grounds." Davies.

4. The consequence or result of reasoning, thought, or experiment.

"If the conclusions arrived at in the preceding examination of the early Roman annals are sound . . ."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (ed. 1855), ch. xiv., § 19, vol. II., p. 554.

5. A resolution, determination, or resolve.

* 6. A problem, a question.

"He wulde his wittes pite To set some conclusion, which shulde be confusion Unto this knight." Gower: l. 146.

* 7. An experiment.

"That mother tries a merciless conclusion Who having two sweet babes, when death takes one Will slay the other, and be true to none." Shakspeare: Rape of Lucrece, l. 160.

¶ To try conclusions: To make experiment or essay of anything.

"To try conclusions, In the basket creep, And break your own neck down." Shakspeare: Hamlet, III. 2.

* 8. An attempt, an object.

"Yit schuld he fayle of his conclusion." Chaucer: O. T., 6, 011.

* 9. Silence, quiet, peace.

"Your wife Octavia, with her modest eyes And still conclusion, shall acquire no honour, Demurring upon me." Shakspeare: Ant. & Cleop., IV. 13.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: The inferential proposition of a syllogism, as compared or contrasted with the premises; the consequence or inference.

" . . . it will be found that every conclusion is deduced, in reality, from two other propositions . . ."—Whately: Logic, bk. I., § 2.

¶ In conclusion: Finally, in fine.

2. Law:

(1) The end of a pleading, conveyance. (Wharton.)

ból, bóy; pòut, jówl; cat, cèll, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -sian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -sious -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl

(2) A binding act. (Wharton.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between conclusion, inference, and deduction: "A conclusion is full and decisive; an inference is partial and indecisive; a deduction leaves the mind in no doubt or hesitation; it puts a stop to all farther [further] reasoning; inferences are special conclusions from particular circumstances; they serve as links in the chain of reasoning. Conclusions are drawn from real facts; inferences are drawn from the appearances of things; deductions only from arguments or assertions. Conclusions are practical; inferences ratiocinative; deductions are final. We conclude from a person's conduct or declarations what he intends to do or leave undone; we infer from the appearance of the clouds, or the thickness of the atmosphere, that there will be a heavy fall of rain or snow; we deduce from a combination of facts, inferences, and assertions that a story is fabricated." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

•côn-clû-gion-al, a. [Eng. conclusion; -al.] Concluding, final.

"Such separations of initiatory deductions, as well as conclusional separations, are made with wine."—Booper: On Lent, p. 278.

côn-clû-sive, a. [Fr. conclusif; Ital. & Sp. conclusivo, from Lat. conclusus, pa. par. of concludo = to conclude.]

I. Ord. Language:

* 1. Concluding, final, at the end, forming a conclusion.

"With two conclusive poems."—R. Brathwaite: Nature's Embassie, 1621. (Index.)

2. Decisive, final; determining or bringing to a close any question, argument, or difference; not admitting of controversion or dispute; unanswerable.

"... has been clearly exhibited in the conclusive discussion of the subject by Mr. Grote, in his History of Greece."—Lodge: Great Early Roman Hist. (ed. 1856), ch. ix., § 3, vol. I, p. 801.

II. Logic: Following as a regular consequence.

"Those that are not men of art not knowing the true forms of syllogism, cannot know whether they are made in right and conclusive modes and figures."—Locke.

¶ Conclusive evidence (Law): Evidence of which from its very nature the law admits of no controversy or contradiction.

Conclusive presumption: An inference or presumption which no proof, however strong, can be admitted to contradict or invalidate.

¶ For the difference between conclusive and final, see FINAL.

côn-clû-sive-ly, adv. [Eng. conclusive; -ly.] In a conclusive or decisive manner, decisively, unanswerably. (Burke.)

côn-clû-sive-néss, s. [Eng. conclusive; -ness.] The quality of being conclusive or decisive; decisiveness.

"Disc of thorax and elytral hamel concolorous."—Trans. Amer. Philol. Soc., 1873, vol. XIII, p. 85.

côn-côl-ôur, a. [Lat. concolor, from con = cum = with, together; and color = a colour; Ital. concolore.] Of one or the same colour; without variety of colour; self-coloured, not marked with a different colour.

"In concolor animals, and such as are confined unto the same colour, we measure not their beauty thereby; for if a crow or blackbird grow white we account it more pretty."—Brewster.

côn-côm-ÿ-tânce, côn-côm-ÿ-tân-ÿ, s. [Fr. concomitance; Lat. concomitantia, neut. pl. pr. par. of concomito = to attend, to accompany: con = cum = with; comito = to attend, to accompany: comes = a companion.]

I. Ord. Lang.: An accompaniment or association; the act or state of accompanying or being concomitant.

II. Technically:

1. Theol.: The doctrine of concomitance holds that Christ's body exists entire under each element.

2. Logic: A collateral argument.

"To argue from a concomitancy to a causality, is not infallibly conclusive."—Glanville: Seopis.

côn-côm-ÿ-tâ-né-ôus, a. [Eng. concomitant(-); -ous.] The same as CONCOMITANT (q.v.).

côn-côm-ÿ-tant, a. & s. [Fr. concomitant, from Lat. concomitans, pr. par. of concomitor.]

A. As adj.: Accompanying or associated with; existing in conjunction with, concurrent.

"It has pleased our wise Creator to annex to several objects, as also to several of our thoughts, a concomitant pleasure."—Locke.

B. As subst.: One who or that which accompanies or is associated or connected with another.

* 1. Of persons: A companion, an associate.

"He made him the chief concomitant of his heir apparent, ..."—Beliquia Wottonianus, p. 212.

2. Of things:

"... the inseparable concomitant of prosperity and glory."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

*côn-côm-ÿ-tant-ly, adv. [Eng. concomitant(-); -ly.] In company or association with others; concurrently. (Walpole.)

côn-côm-ÿ-tâte, v.t. [Lat. concomitatus, pa. par. of concomitor = to attend, to accompany: con = cum = with; comes = a companion.] To attend on, to accompany, to be connected or associated with.

"This simple bloody spectation of the lungs, is differentiated from that which concomitates a pleurisy."—Harvey: On Consumption.

côn-côm-ÿ-tâ-tion, s. [Lat. concomitatus, pa. par. of concomitor.]

Theol.: The same as CONCOMITANCE, II. 1 (q.v.).

côn-côrd, *côn-corde, s. [Fr. concord; Sp. & Ital. concordia, from Lat. concordia: con = cum = with, together; cor (gen. cordis) = the heart, the mind.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Agreement, harmony, accord, peace, or union.

"Methinks that there abides in thee Some concord with humanity."—Wordsworth: To The Daisy, No. 2.

2. A treaty, peace, or league between nations; a compact or covenant.

"It appeareth by the concord made between Henry and Roderick the Irish king."—Davis: On Ireland.

3. Harmony, consonance. [II. 3.]

"Concord of sweet sounds."—Shakspeare: Mer. of Ven., v. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: The agreement of one word with another, as of a verb with its subject in person and number; of an adjective with its noun in gender, number, and case.

âte, ît, îre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sir, marine; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wêlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, ôure, ûnite, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ô; ey = â. qu = kw.

"Have those who have writ about deelenations, con- cords, and syntaxes, lost their labour?"—Locke * 2. Old Law:

(1) An agreement made between two or more persons upon a trespass committed, by way of satisfaction for the damage done.

(2) An agreement between the parties to a fine of land, in reference to the manner in which it should pass. [FINE.] (Burrill.)

"Hence, as I take it, the concord is called a fine levied."—North: Life of Ed. Guiford, l. 204.

3. Music: A combination of notes which requires no further combination following it or preceding it to make it satisfactory to the ear. The concords are perfect fifths, perfect fourths, major and minor thirds, and major and minor sixths, and such combinations of them with the octave and one another as do not entail other intervals. (Grove.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between concord and harmony: "Concord is generally employed for the union of wills and affections; harmony respects the aptitude of minds to coalesce. There may be concord without harmony, and harmony without concord. Persons may live in concord who are at a distance from each other; but harmony is mostly employed for those who are in close connexion, and obliged to co-operate." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* con-cord', v.t. & t. [CONCORD, s.]

A. Trans.: To reconcile, arrange, or set at one; to bring into harmony or accord.

"The French agents pled it to concord conditions for the royal marriage."—Hackett: Life of Williams, l. p. 212.

B. Intrans.: To agree; to be in harmony or accord.

"... many of their old friends and associates, ready to concord with them in any desperate measure."—Lord Clarendon's Life, II, p. 199.

con-cord'-a-ble, a. [Lat. concordabilis, from concoro = accordant, in harmony.]

1. Accordant, agreeing; in accordance or agreement.

"For in croutike of time ago I fynde a tale concordable."

Gower: Confessio Amantis, bk. II.

2. Harmonious, peaceful, quiet.

* con-cord'-a-ble, adv. [Eng. concordable(le); -ly.] In concord, harmony, or agreement; agreeably.

"... that religion, which they do both concordably teach."—Bayly: On the 39 Articles (1629); Ded.

con-cord'-ance, * con-cord'-ance, s. [Fr. concordance; Sp. & Port. concordancia; Ital. concordanza; Low Lat. concordantia, from Class. Lat. concordans, pr. par. of concoro = to be of one mind, to agree together, to harmonize; con = together, and cor (gen. cordis) = the heart.]

* I. Ord. Lang.: Agreement.

1. Followed by with.

"... this letter being such a concordance with those instructions."—Strype: Memorials, an. 1588.

2. Followed by of.

"... their reigns any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding."—Baleigh: His. World, bk. III, ch. I, § 4.

II. Technically:

* 1. Gram.: The agreement of words with each other; as, for instance, the agreement in gender, number, and case, of an adjective with the substantives which it qualifies. [CONCORD, s., II., 1.]

"After three concordances learned, let the master read unto him the epistles of Cicero."—Ascham: Schoolmaster.

2. Biblical Study: A book of references in which all the words existing in a particular version of the Bible are arranged alphabetically—part of the verse being extracted with each, so that if one remember a notable word in any part of the Bible he may find, with scarcely any expenditure of time, where it occurs. A similar work may be constructed to enable students to find where each Hebrew word occurs in the Old Testament, or each Greek one in the New Testament or in the Septuagint. The first known Concordances of the Bible in any language was that of St. Anthony of Padua, who was born in 1195, and died in 1231. His work was called Concordantia Morales, and was of the Latin Vulgate. It formed the basis of a more elaborate concordance, also of the Vulgate, that of Hingo de Santo Caro, better known as Cardinal Hugo. This was published in A.D. 1244. The first Hebrew concordance was that of Rabbi Mordecai Nathan, commenced in 1438 and finished in 1448. The first Greek concordance to the New Testament was that of Xystus Betsileius, whose real name was Birck: it came forth in A.D. 1546. The first English concordance to the New Testament was that of Thomas Gytson, before A.D. 1540: the first to the whole English version of the Bible that of Marbeck, A.D. 1550. These, of course, preceded the appearance in A.D. 1611 of the authorised version of the Bible. The elaborate and well-known work of Cruden appeared first in 1737.

3. Literature: In the same sense as 2, except that the work is constructed to facilitate reference to some other book than the Bible. The first known concordance to Shakespeare was that of Ayscough, in 1790. Mrs. Cowden Clarke's elaborate and most useful work first appeared in 1847. A concordance to Milton was published in Madras in 1856 and 1857, and one to Tennyson in London in 1870.

* con-cord'-an-cy, s. [Eng. concordance(e); -y.] Agreement, concord, accord. (Mountagu.)

* con-cord'-ant, a. & s. [Lat. concordans.]

A. As adjective:

1. In concord, harmony, or accord; harmonious, agreeing, correspondent.

2. Followed by the prep. to:

"... employed in points concordant to their nature, professions, and arts."—Stowe: Valger's Errors.

B. As subst.: That which is in concord, agreement, or accord; concordance; that which accords or brings into concord or agreement.

"Why I did think so, I gave my reasons by special reciting many concordants inter partes."—R. Mountagu: Appeals to Cæsar, p. 84.

* con-cord'-ant-ly, adv. [Eng. concordant(ly); -ly.] In a concordant manner, harmoniously, in agreement.

"They hope to lodge concordantly together an idol and an ephod."—W. Mountagu: Dev. Ess., p. 174.

con-cord'-dāt, * con-cord'-dāte, s. [Fr. concordat; Low Lat. concordatum, from Lat. concordo = to be of one mind.] [CONCORDANCE.]

Eccelesi. & Ch. Hist.: A compact, a convention, or an agreement entered into between the Pope and a sovereign prince or a government for regulating the affairs of the Church within the kingdom. A concordat between Pope Calixtus II. and the Emperor Henry V. of Germany was agreed upon in 1122, which terminated the fierce controversy about investitures, and still to a certain extent regulates the affairs of the Roman Catholic Church in Germany. In 1516 a concordat took place between Pope Leo X. and Francis I., King of France, by which the Chapters were deprived of the right which they had formerly enjoyed of selecting the bishops of the several sees. After much delay and royal importunity the French Parliament reluctantly registered this surrender of privileges on March 15, 1518. Omitting less interesting concordats, a celebrated one took place on July 15, 1801, between Pope Pius VII., acting through Cardinal Consalvi, and Napoleon Bonaparte, then first consul. This engagement re-established the Papal authority in France, but not within its former limits; for it placed the clergy, in temporal and even in some spiritual matters, under the jurisdiction of the civil power. Other concordats with the French government were on January 25, 1813, and Nov. 22, 1817. On August 18, 1825, a concordat concluded between Pope Pius IX. and the Emperor Francis Joseph I. of Austria considerably increased the legal power of the Papacy in that empire; but, exciting much dissatisfaction, it was virtually abolished in 1868. There have been concordats with various other Roman Catholic governments.

"... a barree, ambiguous, delusive concordat had baffled the peremptory demand of Germany for a reformation of the church in its head and in its members."—Milman: His. Latin Christianity, bk. xiv, ch. vii.

* con-cord'-ēr, s. [Eng. concord; -er.] One who promotes concord; a reconciler, a peacemaker.

"The blist concorde that made warres to cease." Taylor: Workes, 1630.

* con-cor'-rūpt, v.t. [Pref. con, and corrupt (q.v.).] To corrupt together or at the same time.

"His foule contagion concorrupted all His fellow-creatures." Sylvester: Tobacco Battered, & con-cōurse (Eng.), * con-cōurse (Scott.), s. [Fr. concourse; Ital. concorso; Sp. concurso, from Lat. concurro = a running together, from concurro = to run together: con = cum = with, together; curro = to run.]

I. Literally:

1. The act of running or meeting together violently; a rush, charge, or onset.

"Concourse in arms, fierce faces thro'ning war." Milton: P. L., II, ll. 641.

2. The act or process of running to or meeting together in one place; a confluence, a gathering.

"Do all the eighty guards, The city's watches, with the people's fears, The concourse of all good men, strike thee nothing?" Ben Jonson: Outline, iv. 2.

* 3. The point of intersection of two bodies or lines; a point of junction.

"So soon as the upper glass is laid upon the lower, so as to touch it at one end, and to touch the drop at the other end, . . . the drop will begin to move towards the concourse of the glasses."—Newton.

4. A number of persons met together in one place, a gathering, an assembly.

* II. Figuratively:

1. Concurrence, co-operation.

"No creature can move, or act, or do anything, without the concourse and co-operation of God."—Bishop Sherlock: Discourse on Providence, ch. II.

2. Agreement, concurrence, approbation.

"That if either the lords of Council or Commissioners for the Peace shall require their concourse at home or abroad, by sending commissioners with theirs to his Majesty and Parliament for that effect,—the Assembly grants full power to them, not only to concur, . . ."—Act Ass. (1643), p. 147.

con-crē-āte, v.t. [Lat. concreatus, pa. par. of concreo: con = with, together; creo = to create; Ital. concreare; Fr. concréter.] To create at the same time or together with others.

con-crē-ā-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONCREATE.]

con-crede, v.t. [Lat. concredo.] [CONCREDIT.] To entrust.

"To defraud the trust concreted to him by the Parliament."—Sir H. Cholmley's Report (1646), p. 4.

con-crēd-it, v.t. [Lat. concreditum, sup. of concredo=to entrust.] To entrust, to commit, to give in charge.

"The which reason may well be applied to excuse every Christian from swearing, who is a most high priest to the Most High God, and hath the most celestial and important matters concreted to him."—Barrow: Sermons, l. 14.

con-crēm-ā-tion, s. [Lat. concrematio: con = cum = with, together, and crematio = a burning, from cremo = to burn.] [CREMATION.] The act of burning several things together or at the same time. (Bailey.)

con-crēm-ent, s. [Lat. concrementum, from concreo = to grow together: con = cum = with, together, and creo = to grow.] A growing together; a mass formed by concretion; a collection.

"There is the cohesion of the matter into a more loose consistency, like clay, and thereby it is prepared to the concrement of a pebble or flint."—Hale: Origin of Mankind.

con-crēs-çence, s. [Lat. concrescens, pr. par. of concreo.] The act of gathering or forming into a mass by the growing together or coalescing of separate parts.

"Seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor inchoate, how any other substance should thence take concrecence, hath not been taught."—Kalish: History of the World.

con-crēs-çible, a. [Fr. concreçible; Ital. concreçibile, from Lat. concreo.] Capable of gathering or forming into a mass by coalescence; capable of congealing.

"They formed a . . . fixed concreçible all."—Fourcroy: Trans. (Webster.)

con-crēs-çive, a. [Lat. concreo(o); Eng. suff. -ive.] Growing together, or gathering into a mass; coalescing. (Ec. Rev.)

con-crēto, v.t. & t. [Lat. concretus, pa. par. of concreo = to grow together: con = together, and creo = to grow.]

A. Intransitive:
1. To grow together, to coalesce into one mass.

(1) Followed by with:
"The mineral . . . matter, thus concreted with the crystalline. . . ."—Woodward.

(2) Absolutely:
". . . the salt concreted in regular figures. . ."—Newton.

2. To coagulate.
"The blood . . . could not be made to concrete, . . ."—Arbuthnot.

B. Trans.: To form by concretion; to form by the union of previously separate particles.

"That there are in our inferiour world divers bodies, that are concreted out of others, is beyond all dispute; we see it in the meteors."—Hale: Origin of Mankind.

con-crēto, a. & s. [Fr. concret (m.), concrète (f.); Sp., Port., & Ital. concreto, all from Lat. concretus.] [CONCRETE, v.]

A. As adjective:
I. Ord. Lang.: Grown together, formed by the union of many particles into one mass.
"The first concrete state, or consistent surface, of the chace, must be of the same figure as the last liquid state."—Burnet.

II. Technically:
1. Logic:
+ (1) Of names: Standing for a thing—as John, sea, table—as distinguished from standing for an attribute of a thing—as whiteness, old age. This is the sense in which the schoolmen used the logical term concretus. (J. S. Mill: Logic, bk. i., ch. ii., § 4.)

(2) Special, as opposed to general. John Stuart Mill considers that the practice of using the word concrete in this sense, and abstract in the sense of resulting from abstraction or generalization, has grown up in modern times, being either introduced by Locke or at least having gained currency from his example. Mr. Mill himself avoids it, and employs the word concrete in his Logic only in sense 1. (q.v.). (J. S. Mill: Logic, bk. i., ch. ii., § 4.)

2. Arith., Math., &c. (Of numbers and quantities): Stated to be of certain persons or things as opposed to an abstract number. Thus in the expressions, 6 quires of paper, or 1,000 soldiers, 6 and 1,000 are concrete numbers, but 4, 2, 27, are abstract.

"Thus the Concrete process is special, and the Abstract is general. The character of the Concrete is experimental, physical, phenomenal, while the Abstract is purely logical, rational. The Concrete part of every mathematical question is necessarily founded on consideration of the external world, while the Abstract part consists of a series of logical deductions."—Martineau: Comte's Positive Philosophy, bk. i., ch. 1, p. 41.

3. The Physical Sciences (Of a Science): Having as its subject of investigation the description and classification of particular objects as opposed to a science having for its aims the investigation of laws. Thus, zoology and geology are mainly concrete sciences; pure mathematics is an abstract one.

4. Gram. (Of words): Referring to something special, and hence resolvable into two words. Thus, to love is concrete; it can be resolved into (1) the state of being or existing, and (2) into the state of spreading that existence temporarily or permanently as the state of love. But the verb to be is solely abstract.

B. As substantive:

*1. Ord. Lang.: A mass formed by the union of parts or particles previously separated. [CONCRETION.]

2. Building: A composition used for the foundations of large buildings, or for securing stability or freedom from damp. It is composed of lime, coarse gravel and sand in various proportions, mixed up thoroughly with water.

con-crē-tēd, pa. par. & a. [CONCRETE, v.t.]

con-crēto-ly, adv. [Eng. concrete; -ly.] In a concrete manner; the opposite of abstractly, or, as it was formerly called by some, abstractedly. (Cudworth.)

con-crēto-ness, s. [Eng. concrete; -ness.]

1. Gen.: The quality of being concrete.
2. Spec.: Coagulation; the condensation of fluids into a more or less solid mass.

con-crēt-ēr, s. [Eng. concrete(o); -er.]

Sugar-boiling: An apparatus for concentrating syrup, by allowing it to flow in a boiling condition over the surface of a heated pan, and then subjecting it to the heat of a copper cylinder revolving over a fire, and having an internal hotblast. The syrup in a concentrated condition is discharged at the lower end. (Knight.)

con-crē-tiŋg, pr. par. & a. [CONCRETE, v.]

con-crē-tion, s. [Fr. concrétion; Prov. concrecio; Ital. concrezioni, from Lat. concretio = a uniting, condensing, or congealing.] [CONCRETE.]

I. Ordinary Language:
1. The act of concreting or growing together.

"Some plants, upon the top of the sea, are supposed to grow of some concretion of slime from the water, where the sea stirreth little."—Bacon: Natural Hist.

2. The mass thus formed.
"Heat, in general, doth not resolve and attenuate the juices of a human body; nor do great heat will produce concretions."—Arbuthnot: On Animals.

II. Geol.: Either a mechanical aggregation or a chemical union of particles of calcareous or other material producing spherical, oval, or less regularly formed balls in argillaceous or other strata. Such nodules have frequently a shell or other organism constituting the nucleus around which the aggregation or union has taken place. [CONCRETIONARY DEPOSITS.]

† con-crē-tion-al, a. [Eng. concretion; -al.] Pertaining to concretions, containing concretions, concretionary. (Brande.)

con-crē-tion-ar-ŷ, a. [Fr. concrétionnaire.] Characterised by, or containing, concretions.

"Among the most remarkable examples of concretionary structure. . ."—Lyell: Manual of Geol., ch. iv.

concretionary deposits.

Geol.: Strata are not arranged primarily by their mechanical structure, but by the succession of life which they contain. No epoch, great or small, is therefore called that of concretionary deposits, but these exist more or less, here and there, in all parts of the system. The more notable concretions are those described by Prof. Sedgwick as existing in the magnesian limestone of the north of England, which in some places is so studded with them that it looks like a great pile of cannon balls fitted for ordnance of different calibres, with which are commingled smaller shot, some no larger than a pea. (Lyell, &c.)

* con-crē-tive, a. [Eng. concret(e); -ive.] Producing or tending to produce concretions.

"When wood and other bodies petrify, we do not ascribe their induration to cold, but unto salinuous spirit, or concretive juices."—Brown: Vulgar Errours.

* con-crē-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. concretive; -ly.]

*1. Concretively, as opposed to abstractly.

" . . . whereby it is urged, that although baptism take away the guilt as concretively redounding to the person, yet the simple abstracted guilt, as to the nature remains. . ."—Bp. Taylor: Polem. Disc., p. 807. Bp. Rochester's Lett.

2. In a concrete manner; so as to form concretions.

* con-crē-tūre, s. [Eng. concret(e); -ure.] A concretion. (Johnson.)

* con-crew (ew as ū), v.t. [Pref. con, and crew (q.v.).] To grow or gather together; to unite.

"And his faire lockes, that went with olintment sweet To be embaulin'd, and sweat out dauntly dew, He let to grow and gresily to concrew."—Spenser: R. Q., IV, vii. 40.

* con-erim-in-ā-tion, s. [Lat. concrimatio: con = cum = with, together; crimatio = a charging, accusing.] [CRIMINATION.] A joint accusation. (Maunder.)

* con-cū-bin-a-çy, s. [Eng. concupin(e); -acy.] The same as CONCUBINAGE (q.v.).

con-cū-bin-age, s. [Fr., from Lat. concupinatus.] [CONCUBINE.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act or state of living with one of the opposite sex without being legally married.

2. Law & Hist.: Concubinage was tolerated among the patriarchs (Gen. xxv. 6) and by the Mosaic law (Exod. xxi. 9–12, Deut. xx. 14) and was largely practised by Solomon (1 Kings xi. 3). It was tolerated also among most if not all other Oriental nations, as well as among the Greeks and the Romans to the time of Constantine. The last-named emperor, justly believing that Christianity allowed only marriage and not concubinage (Mark xix. 4, 5; 1 Cor. vii. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 2), rendered the practice illegal. The clergy of the 3rd, 10th, 11th, and other centuries were charged with what is often called concubinage, but in many cases the relations between celliate clergy and monks on the one hand and women living in their houses were not what is generally understood by concubinage. The law of England sanctions only proper marriage; it gives no countenance to concubinage. But on the Continent, morganatic or left-handed marriages sometimes contracted by royal personages are essentially the same as the concubinage of the old Romans. [MORGANATIC.]

* con-cū-bin-al, a. [Lat. concupinialis.] Pertaining to or of the nature of concubinage.

* con-cū-bin-ār-ŷ-an, a. & s. [Eng. concupin(ary); -ar-ŷ.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to or living in concubinage.

" . . . the married and concupinarian, as well as looser clergy."—Milman: Hist. Latin Christianity, bk. xiv., ch. 1.

B. As subst.: One who practises concubinage.

* con-cū-bin-a-ry, a. & s. [Ital. concupin(ario) = one living in concubinage.]

A. As adjective:

1. Pertaining or relating to concubinage.

2. Living in concubinage.
"The said John, which in the open concells had grievously condemned all the concupin(ary) priests, was taken himselfe in the same crime."—Bishop Hall: Honour of married Clergy, lib. iii. 15.

B. As subst.: One living in concubinage.

* con-cū-bin-ate, s. [Lat. concupinatus; Ital. concupinato.] The condition or position of a concubine; concubinage.

"Holy marriage in all men is preferred before unclear concupinate in any."—Bp. Taylor: Disc. from Popery, lib. 3, § 2.

con-cū-bine, * con-cū-byŋ, s. [Fr. concupine; Lat. concupinus (m.), concupina (f.), from concupo = to lie together: con = cum = with, together, and cupo = to lie.]

*1. Originally of the common gender, being applied to a person of either sex living in concubinage.

fāt, fāt, fāre, amidst, wāt, fāt, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, there; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, er, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

"The Lady Anne did falsely and traitorously procure divers of the King's daily and familiar servants to be her adulterers and concubines."—Judgment of Anne Boleyn. (Trench: Select Glossary, pp. 44, 45.)

2. A woman who cohabits with a man without being lawfully married to him.

3. A lawful wife, but of inferior rank or condition. Such were Hagar and Keturah, the concubines of Abraham.

con-cū-bin-ize, v.t. [Eng. concubin(e); -ize.] To take or adopt as a concubine.

con-cū-cate, v.t. [Lat. conculcat, pa. par. of conculco = to tread together; cum = with, together, and calco = to tread; calx (genit. calcis) = the heel.] To tread down, to trample under foot (lit. & fig.).

"But he (that notwithstanding) growth from evil to worse, oppressing and conculcating the church and sanctuary of God."—For: Martyrs; Becket's Letter to the Pope, p. 197.

con-cū-cā-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONCULCATE.]

con-cū-cā-tīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONCULCATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj. (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of trampling or treading under foot; conculation.

con-cū-cā-tion, s. [Lat. conculcatio, from conculcat, pa. par. of conculco.] [CONCULCATE.] The act of trampling or treading on.

"The trampling of the onward Court is [of] the Temple by the Gentiles."—Henry More: Mystery of Iniquity, bk. II, ch. 12, § 1. (Trench: On some def. in our Eng. Dic., p. 18.)

con-cū-ben-çy, s. [Lat. concupiscens, pr. par. of concupisco = to lie with or together; cum = with, together; cupio = to lie.] A living together as man and wife; cohabitation.

con-cū-pis-çence, s. [Fr. concupiscence; Lat. concupiscētia, from concupisco = to desire strongly; cum = with, together; cupio = to desire.] An unlawful, improper, or excessive libidinous desire; lust, lechery.

"Our wonted ornaments now soild and stain'd, And in our faces evident the signs Of foul concupiscence."—Milton: P. L., ix, 1077.

con-cū-pis-çent, a. [Lat. concupiscens, pr. par. of concupisco.] Addicted to unlawful or excessive libidinous desires; lustful, lecherous.

"The concupiscēt clown is overdone."—Lamb: Letter to Coleridge.

con-cū-pis-çen-tial, con-cū-pis-çen-tial (ti as sh), a. [Eng. concupiscen-tial.] Relating or pertaining to concupiscence or lustful desires.

"I thought you had quenched those concupiscēntial flames."—Hovell: Parly of Beasts, p. 184.

con-cū-pis-çen-tious, a. [Eng. concupiscen-tious.] The same as CONCUPISENT (q.v.).

"We were carnal, concupiscēntious, idle, unthankful, unclean."—Poole: Martyrs, iii, 252.

con-cū-pis-çi-ble, a. [Lat. concupiscibilis, from concupisco.]

1. Concupiscent; entertaining or provoking lustful desires, lecherous.

"The vile conclusion I now begin with grief and shame to utter: He would not, but by gift of my chaste body To his concupiscible intemperate lust, Release my brother."—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, v, 1.

2. Exciting the desire or wish for anything.

"Now there being a double object for the will of man to work upon, good and evil, there is likewise a double faculty considerable in it; the one we call a concupiscible, the other an irascible faculty; by the one we follow that which is good, by the other we run from that which is evil."—Bp. Beveridge, vol. II, Ser. 137.

3. To be desired, desirable.

"Never did thy eyes behold . . . anything in this world more concupiscible than widow Wadman."—Berners: Trist. Shandy, v, 47.

con-cū-pis-çi-ble-ness, s. [Eng. concupiscible-ness.] Concupiscence, lustful desire, lechery.

con-cū-py, s. [A corruption of concupiscence (q.v.).] Concupiscence; unlawful or lustful desires, lechery.

"Hell tickle it for his concupy."—Shakespeare: Troil. & Cress., v, 2.

con-cūr, con-curre, v.t. [Lat. concurro = to run together; con = cum = with, together; curro = to run. In Fr. concurrir; Ital. concorrere; Sp. concurrir.]

I. Literally:

1. To run together; to meet in battle.

"None they fierce encountering both conquer'd With grisly looks, and faces like their faces."—Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. xxiv, 673, 4.

2. To meet or come together at one point; to coincide.

II. Figuratively:

† 1. To join together, to unite; to meet together.

"Judgment and genius so concur in thee."—Congress: To Sir Godfrey Kneller.

* 2. To be conjoined or added to.

" . . . it fair prohibitions of reason concur with it, this argument hath all the strength it can have."—Tilston.

† 3. To join or agree in any action; to act jointly.

4. To contribute or help in any common object or plan.

"Who more than Pelus shone in wealth and power? What stars concurring bless'd his ontel hour?"—Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. xxiv, 673, 4.

† With the prep. to befor the effect contributed to:

"Extremes in nature equal good produce, Extremes in man concur to general use."—Pope: Moral Essays, iii, 162.

5. To agree, to assent.

(1) Absolutely:

" . . . the concurrence of the Lords was asked: the Lords concurred . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

(2) With the prep. in before that which is agreed to:

"Tories and Whigs had concurred, or had affected to concur, in paying honour to Walker . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

(3) With the prep. with:

"It is not evil simply to concur with the heathens either in opinion or action . . ."—Hooker.

† For the difference between to concur and to coincide, see COINCIDE.

con-cūr-bite, s. [O. Fr. curcubite; Ital. & Lat. curcubita.] The same as CUCURBIT (q.v.).

"Viola, croclets and sublimatories, Concurbites, and alembikes eke."—Chaucer: C. T., 12, 721.

con-cūr-raunt, pr. par. or a. [CONCUR-RENT.]

con-cūr-rence, s. [Fr. concurrence, from Lat. concurrentia, from concurrere, pr. par. of concurro = to run together.]

1. A meeting or joining together; union or conjunction.

"We have no other measure but our own ideas, with the concurrence of other probable reasons, to persuade us."—Locke.

* 2. A happening together, a conjunction.

3. A combination or coincidence.

"He views our behaviour in every concurrence of affairs . . ."—Addison: Spectator.

4. A joining or uniting together in a manner contributing to the furtherance of any object; assistance, co-operation.

"Those things which are made of God himself immediately by himself, without the concurrence of second causes . . ."—Hakewill: Apologie, p. 18.

† Followed by the prep. to befor the effect or object helped:

" . . . the necessity of the divine concurrence to it."—Rogers.

5. Agreement, assent, consent.

(1) Absolutely:

" . . . the formal concurrence of the Northern clergy . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

"Their concurrence in persuasion, about some material points belonging to the same polity, is not strange."—Hooker: Eccles. Pol., Preface.

con-cūr-rence-çy, s. [Eng. concurrēnce(s); -y.]

1. Concurrence, agreement, consent.

"All of them (the last excepted) were dejected by King James without any concurrency of the Duke."—Cobbold to his Sacred Majesty.

2. A union of power, rights or claims, joint power or authority.

"A bishop might have officers, if there was a concurrency of jurisdiction between him and the archdeacon."—Ayliffe.

con-cūr-rent, a. & s. [Fr. concurrent, from Lat. concurrere, pr. par. of concurro.]

A. As adjective:

1. Existing or happening at the same time (with the prep. with):

"Such are the changes which science recognises in the wire itself, as concurrent with the visual changes taking place in the eye."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (4th ed.), viii, 2, p. 174.

2. Acting in union or conjunction; contributing to the same effect or result; in agreement.

" . . . and this by the concurrent evidence of our best paleontologists seems frequently to be the case."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. x., p. 333.

* 3. Conjoined, united, associated, concomitant.

"There is no difference between the concurrent echo and the iterant, but the quickness or slowness of the return."—Bacon.

4. Possessing joint or equal authority or claims.

* 5. Agreeing, consenting.

" . . . the king's concurrent assent . . ."—Frynes: Treachery and Dialogy of Popists.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of persons:

(1) An opponent, an adversary.

"One of them named Columbus, before to follo his concurrence, howbeit hee had gotten before some small hurt."—Holland: Suetonius, p. 149.

(2) A competitor, a rival.

2. Of things:

(1) Anything which concurs or contributes in causing any effect; a contributory cause.

(2) An equal or joint right or claim.

"To all affairs of importance there are three necessary concurrents, without which they can never be dispatched; time, industry, and faculties."—Decay of Piety.

II Chron.: The solitary day in an ordinary year, one of the two in a leap year, constituting the excess above 52 weeks—52 x 7 = 364 days. It is so called because it concurs with the solar cycle, the course of which it follows.

concurrent endowment.

Law & Ecclesiol.: The endowment of all religious eects which will accept endowment, so as to make a nearer approach to religious equality than if only one religious denomination were endowed. Politicians sometimes call it "levelling up," and oppose it to disestablishment and disendowment, termed "levelling down."

concurrent jurisdiction.

Law: The jurisdiction of various courts, any one of which, at the option of the suitor, has authority to try his case.

con-cūr-rence-ly, adv. [Eng. concurrent; -ly.]

* 1. In concurrence or union with.

"They did not vote these special and precise means concurrently with the voice of God."—W. Mountagu: Dev. Ess. (1648), p. 801.

2. At the same time, contemporaneously.

* con-cūr-rence-ness, s. [Eng. concurrent-ness.] The quality or state of being concurrent; concurrence. (Scott.)

con-cūr-ring, pr. par., a., & s. [CONCUR.]

con-cuss'-i-ôn (ss as sh), s. [Lat. concussio, from concussus, pa. par. of concutio = to shake violently: con = cum = with, together; quatio = to shake.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. The act or process of shaking or agitating.

"Zen the oak Thrives by the rude concussion of the storm."
Cooper: Task, I, 373.

2. The state of being shaken or agitated; an agitation or shock.

"The strong concussion on the hearing side Rold'f beat the vessel to the island's side."
Pope: Homér's Odyssey, bk. ix., l. 571-2.

3. The act or state of being dashed or knocked violently against another body.

II. Figuratively:

† 1. A shock.

"... a concussion to those props of our vanity, our strength and youth, . . ."—Pope: Letter to Steele (1712).

2. The act of obtaining money by threats or violence; extortion.

"And then concussion, rapture, pillaries, Their catalogue of accusations fill."
Daniel: Civ. Wars, iv, 75.

B. Technically:

† (1) Concussion of the brain:

Med.: A shaking of the brain produced by a sudden shock or any similar cause, and generally resulting in at least temporary insensibility. Sometimes recovery takes place in a few minutes, the sufferer—as the writer, from experience gained when thrown from a horse, can testify—first seeing everything lanky black, then dark red, then pink, after which the landscape returns. In severer cases insensibility may remain for days instead of minutes, coma at first being deep, then less profound, and finally passing away, inflammatory action in some cases supervening on the previous depression. In the worst cases the coma is never removed, but is succeeded by the yet deeper sleep of death. In many cases there is difficulty in distinguishing between concussion of the brain, in which the organ is congested but not permanently injured, and compression of the brain, produced by extravasation of blood upon the surface.

(2) Concussion of the spine:

Med.: Injury, temporary or permanent, to the spine, produced by a sudden shock.

concussion-bellows, s.

Music: A self-acting reservoir for regulating the supply of wind to an organ.

concussion-fuze, s. A fuze ignited by the concussion of a shell when it strikes.

con-cuss'-i-ôn-a-ry (ss as sh), s. [Eng. concussion; -ary.] One who obtains or demands money or property with threats or violence.

"A wicked magistrate, and publicke concussionary or extortioner, by giving a piece of bread to dogs barking at him, so to stop their mouths, may thus save his thefts, and other depredations of his vile life."
—Time's Storehouse, 931.

con-cuis'-sive, n. [Formed as if from a Lat. concussivus, from concussus, pa. par. of concutio. [CONCUSSOR.] Having the power or quality of shaking or agitating.

con-cu'-ti-ënt (ti as sh), a. [Lat. concutiens, pr. par. of concutio.] [CONCUSSION.] Dashing or meeting together violently.

"Like two concurrent cannon-balls."
—Thackeray: Virginians, ch. xl.

cond, v. [CONDUK.]

con-da-min'-é-a, s. [Named after Charles-Marie la Condamine, a French explorer and astronomer, who was born January 20, 1701, and died Feb. 4, 1774.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Cinchonaceæ, family Ecdyotidæ. Condaminea corymbosa, a native of the Peruvian Andes, has a valuable fever bark. It is not, however, equal to Cinchona, for the adulteration of which it is said to be used. C. tinctoria, which grows in South America, is a dye plant.

con-dē-çen-çy, s. [Lat. condecensia.] A fitness, suitability, or appropriateness.

"A condecency or suitability unto his Righteousness."
—Owen: On Hebrews, l. 77.

con-dē-çent-ly, adv. [Formed as if from an adj. condecens, with suff. -ly.] Fitly, appropriately.

"Fitly, condecensly, answerably, becomingly."
—Vines: Lord's Supper [1877], p. 204.

con-dēc'-or-ate, v.t. [Pref. con-, and decorate (q.v.).] To join or assist in decorating.

"Many choice and fragrant gardens also condecorate her, which together make a combined beauty, though seemingly separate."
—Herbert: Travels, 1633.

con-del, s. [CANDEL.]

con-dēmn' (1), (n silent), v.t. & i. [Fr. condamner; Ital. condannare; Sp. & Port. condenar; Lat. condemno, from con = cum = with, together, and damno = to condemn, to damn.] [DAMN.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) To find or pronounce guilty or criminal; to give judgment, sentence, or doom against.

"After many examinations, at last they condemned him [Tyndall] by virtue of the emperor's decree made in the assembly at Aurbrough, . . ."
—Tyndall: Life by Fox.

(2) With the prep. of before the matter of which one is found guilty.

(b) With the prep. to before the penalty or punishment awarded.

"The son of man shall be betrayed unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death."
—Matt. xx, 13.

(2) To fine (followed by the prep. in before the penalty or fine).

"And the king of Egypt put him down at Jerusalem, and condemned the land in an hundred talents of silver."
—2 Chron. xxxvi, 2.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To censure, blame, reprove, or find fault with.

"Then she the senses checks, which oft do err, And oft she doth condemn what they prefer."
—Davies: Immortality of the Soul, l. 1.

(2) To bear witness or evidence against; to convict.

"The righteous that is dead shall condemn the ungodly which are living."
—Wisdom, iv, 13.

(3) To declare or pronounce to be unfit for use, to reject; to cause to be forfeited.

II. Theol.: To sentence to the penalty designed as the appropriate punishment of the unbeliever and the impenitent sinner. [CONDEMNATION, II.]

"... he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God."
—John iii, 18.

B. Intrans.: To pronounce guilty or criminal; to give sentence against.

"Considered as a Judge, it condemns where it ought to absolve, and pronounces absolution where it ought to condemn."
—Fiddes: Sermons.

† For the difference between to condemn and to blame see BLAME; for that between to condemn and to reprobate, see REPROBATE.

con-dēmn' (2), (n silent), v.t. [Probably the same as condemn (1). Or Fr. condamner une porte, fenêtre.] To block up in such a manner as to prevent all entrance or passage. (Scotch.)

"The Frenchmen—maned artillie on the college steeple, and also upon the walls of the abbey kirk; and condemned all the close and wall heids that was within the castle: that no man that was within the castle durst move throw the close, nor pas to the wall heidia."
—Pitcott's Chron., p. 483.

con-dēmn'-na-ble, a. [Eng. condemns; -able.] Liable or deserving to be condemned; culpable, blamable.

"He commands to deface the print of a cauldron in ashes; which strictly to observe were condecensable superstition."
—Brown.

con-dēmn'-nā-tion, * con-dēmp-na-tion, s. [Lat. condemnatio, from condemno = to condemn (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of condemning or pronouncing guilty or criminal.

"When Christ asked the woman, 'Hath no man condemned thee?' he certainly spoke, and was understood by the woman to speak, of a legal and judicial condemnation; otherwise, her answer, 'No man, Lord,' was not true. In every other sense of condemnation, as blame, censure, reproof, private judgment, and the like, many had condemned her . . ."
—Foley: Moral Philosophy, bk. III, pt. III.

2. The state or condition of being condemned.

"There is therefore now no condemnation to them . . ."
—Rom. viii, 1.

3. The punishment or penalty inflicted.

"The condemnation or punishment is either to reduce him that erreth into the train of vertue, or to preserve a multitude from damage, . . ."
—Str T. Elyot: Governour, bk. II, ch. 9.

4. The ground or reasons of being condemned.

5. The act of blaming, censuring, or finding fault. (See example under 1.)

II. Theol.: The act of God in condemning the unbelieving and impenitent sinner; the state of being so condemned; the penalty inflicted. That penalty is described in Scripture in such fearful terms as these: "Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels . . ." (Matt. xxv, 41.)

† con-dēmn'-na-tōr-ÿ, a. [Formed as if from Lat. condemnatorius, from condemnatus, pa. par. of condemno = to condemn.] Condemning; containing or involving a sentence of condemnation.

"... the first condemnatory sentence, . . ."
—Government of the Tongue.

con-dēmnēd' (n silent), pa. par. or a. [CONDEMN.]

A. As pa. par.: (In senses corresponding to those of the verb).

B. As adjective:

I. Literally:

1. Pronounced guilty or criminal; doomed.

2. Used for or appropriated to persons condemned to death.

"The visiting justices have access to the condemned cell, and upon their order it is understood that relatives of the unfortunate man will be admitted."
—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 13th, 1891.

II. Figuratively:

1. Pronounced unfit; sentenced to forfeiture or rejection.

* 2. Damned, abandoned.

"Condemned villain, I do apprehend thee."
—Shakespeare: Romeo & Juliet, v, 2.

con-dēmn'-nēd-ly, adv. [Eng. condemned; -ly.] In a manner deserving blame or condemnation.

"He that hath wisdom to be truly religious, cannot be condemnedly a fool."
—Folcham, pt. 1, Res. 49.

con-dēmn'-er (n silent), s. [Eng. condemns; -er.] One who condemns; a censurer, blamer, or censor.

"Some few are the only refusers and condemners of this catholic practice."
—Taylor: Worthy Commun.

con-dēmn'-lîng (n silent), pr. par., a., & s. [CONDEMN.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of passing a sentence of condemnation; condemnation; the state of being condemned.

"... though to thy own condemning."
—Milton: Samson Agonistes.

con-dēn'-sa-bîl'-i-tÿ, s. [Eng. condensable; -ity.] The quality of being condensable; capability of being condensed or compressed.

con-dēn'-sa-ble, a. [Eng. condense; -able.] Capable or admitting of being condensed or compressed.

"This agent meets with resistance in the moveable; and not being in the utmost extremity of density, but condensable yet further, every resistance works something upon the mover to condense it."
—Digby: On the Soul.

con-dēn'-sâte, v.t. & i. [CONDENSATE, a.]

A. Trans.: To condense; to compress into a closer form.

"They say a little critical learning makes one proud; if there were more it would condense and compact itself into less room."
—Hammond: Works, iv, 611.

B. Intrans.: To become condensed.

con-dēn'-sâte, a. [Lat. condensatus, pa. par. of condenso = to make thick, to condense; con = cum = with, together; denso = to make thick; densus = thick, dense.] Condensed, made thicker and closer, compressed.

con-dēn'-sâ-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONDENSATE, v.]

con-dēn'-sâ-tîng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONDENSATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of condensing; condensation.

con-dēn'-sâ-tion, s. [Fr. condensation; Sp. condensación; Port. condensação, all from Lat. condensatio.]

state of being brought into smaller bulk, but with a proportionate increase of gravity; consolidation.

... is decidedly not a star, but nebula of the same general character with the rest in a state of extreme condensation.—Herchel: Astronomy, 6th ed. (1838), 387.

2. Fig. The condensing of language, conciseness, brevity.

"He [Goldsmith] was a great and perhaps an unequalled master of the arts of selection and condensation."—Macaulay.

II. Chem. & Physics: The reduction of anything to another and denser form, as of a vapour or gas to a liquid, or a liquid to a solid.

¶ (1) Condensation of gases or vapours:

Chem. & Physics: The passage of gases or vapours from the aeriform to the liquid state. It is sometimes called also the liquefaction of vapours. It may be due to one of three causes: cooling, compression, or chemical affinity. Before the first or second of these causes can operate, the vapour must be saturated. Various salts also condense vapours by means of chemical affinity. When vapours are condensed their latent heat becomes free. (Gann.)

(2) Condensation of liquids:

Chem. & Physics: The reduction of a liquid to smaller bulk, with a proportionate increase in the specific gravity.

Jōn'-dēn-sa-tive, a. [Fr. condensatif (m.), condensative (f.); Sp. & Port. condensativo.] Having the property of condensing.

ōōn'-dēnse, v.t. & i. [Fr. condenser; Sp. & Port. condensar; Ital. condensare, from Lat. condenseo = to make dense; condensus = very close together: con=fully, and densus=thick, dense.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit. (of material things). To render more dense by any process which brings the parts or particles more closely together.

"For them the rocks dissolved into a food, The dews condensed into angelic food."

2. Fig. (of things not material): To render denser, more compact or solid, to concentrate.

"... the Greeks their onset dare, Condense their powers, and wait the coming war." Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. xi, l. 275-6.

II. Chem. & Physics: To reduce into another and denser form, as to reduce a gas into a liquid or a liquid into a solid. [CONDENSATION.]

B. Intrans. : To become more dense, thicker, or more compact, as to pass from a gaseous into a liquid or from a liquid into a more or less solid state.

"All vapours, when they begin to condense and coalesce into small parcels, ..."—Newton: Opticks.

ōōn'-dēnse, a. [Ital. condensio, from Lat. condensus = very dense.] Condensed, very dense or simply dense, highly compact or simply compact.

"They might be separated without consulting into the huge condense bodies of planets."—Bentley: Sermons.

ōōn'-dēnsed', pa. par. & a. [CONDENSE, v.]

condensed beer, s. Beer reduced in bulk by condensation. A patent for doing so was taken out in 1875 by P. E. Lockwood. (Haydn.)

condensed milk, s. Milk reduced greatly in bulk and rendered proportionately denser. M. Gall Borden, residing in the vicinity of New York, in 1849 invented a process for the condensation of milk, which since 1866 has been carried out extensively in Britain.

condensed wave, s. Acoustics: A very limited length within a tube in which alone the air is condensed by a piston moving a short distance from its place within the tube. (Gann.)

condensed wort, s. Wort greatly reduced in bulk and proportionately increased in specific gravity.

ōōn'-dēn'-sōd-nēss, s. [Eng. condensed; -ness.] The quality of being compressed or condensed (lit. & fig.).

"This condensedness, this intensity in Cordelia's temperament and misfortune, is equally displayed in what she says of a gentle and tender kind."—Cowden Clarke: Shakesp. Characters, p. 173.

bōl, bōy; pōūt, jōwī; eat, cēll, chorus, qhīn, bench; go, gēm; thīn, thīs; sīn, aq; expect. Xēnophon, exist. -īng. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = chūn; -tion, -gion = zhūn. -tious, sion. -cious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

ōōr'-dēn'-sēr, s. [Eng. condens(e); -er.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who or that which condenses.

II. Technically:

1. Steam-engine: An apparatus for reducing to a liquid form the steam in front of the piston, so as to obtain a partial vacuum at that point, and thus utilize the natural pressure of the atmosphere. Watt invented the injection condenser and the separate condenser. The surface condenser has a series of flat chambers or tubes, usually the latter, in which the steam is cooled by a body of water surrounding the tubes. Distilled water for ships' use is obtained by the condensation of steam in a surface condenser. (Knight.)

2. Distilling: The still-condenser is an apparatus generally made of the worm-tub form; the coil containing the alcoholic vapour traversing a tub which receives a constant accession of cold water, condensing the vapour in the coil. The liquid escapes at a cock below. (Knight.)

3. Metal: An apartment in which metallic or deleterious gaseous fumes are condensed to prevent their escape into, and contamination of, the atmosphere. The device consists of a prolonged duct for the fumes, with showers of water to condense the arsenical, sulphurous, and other fugitive volatile matters. It also serves an economical purpose in saving fugitive fumes of lead, zinc, mercury, sulphur, antimony, &c. (Knight.)

4. Gas-making: An apparatus in which the crude gas from the retort is cooled, and the ammoniacal liquor and tar extracted from it. (Knight.)

5. Sugar manufacture: The Degrand (De-rosne) condenser consists of a vertical series of convoluted steam-pipes, over which trickles the sugar-cane juice from the defecator. (Knight.)

6. Wool manufacturers: A device for compacting the narrow silvers from a carding-machine so as to bring them into the condition of slubs. (Knight.)

7. Dentistry: A tool for packing foil for plugging teeth. (Knight.)

8. Pneumat.: An air-pump for filling a chamber with air or gas at a pressure above the atmospheric. (Knight.)

9. Optics: A lens to gather and concentrate the rays collected by the mirror and direct them upon the object. (Knight.)

"If now the focus be carefully adjusted and the achromatic condenser be employed for the purpose of defining the outline with the utmost precision..."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. 7, p. 184.

10. Electricity:

(1) An instrument for concentrating electricity by the effect of induction. It usually consists of a coufolded sheet of tin-foil, whose layers are separated by a thin sheet having a non-conducting surface.

(2) With induction apparatus, a device for absorption or suppression of the extra current, induced by the rapid breaks in the main current.

(3) An instrument in which an electric spark passes between the poles in a closed glass cylinder, so as to be employed in burning metals in an atmosphere of any given tenacity or specific chemical character, to obtain the spectra of metals or gases free from accidental characteristics of the general atmosphere for the time being. (Knight.)

ōōn'-dēn'-sīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONDENSE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (In senses corresponding to those of the verb.)

"... but the condensing molecules have not yet coalesced to particles sufficiently large to reflect sensibly the waves of light."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), x. 272.

C. As subst.: The act of rendering more dense; the state of being rendered more dense.

"... the cold approacheth, and by condensing, drives the vapours into clouds or drops."—Derham: Physico-Theology, a. Note 1.

condensing force, a.

Elect.: The relation in frictional electricity between the whole charge which the collecting plate can take while under the influence of the second plates to that which it would take if alone; the relation of the total quantity of electricity on the collecting plate to that which remains free. (Gann.)

condensing plate, s.

Elect.: One of two plates used for experimenting on frictional electricity, the other being called the collecting plate. (Gann.) Physics, transl. by Atkinson, § 603.)

condensing pump, s. An apparatus for compressing air or any other gas. It consists essentially of a piston moving in a cylinder or receiver, with a valve on its upper side, opening or closing as the piston ascends or descends. It is used chiefly for charging liquids with gases. (Gann.)

condensing syringe, s. A syringe whose valves are so arranged as to take air above and condense it below this piston, so as to condense air into any chamber to which the foot of the syringe is secured. (Knight.)

ōōn'-dēn'-sī-ty, s. [Eng. condense, a.; & connective; and suff. -ty.]

1. Lit.: The state of being condensed; density.

† 2. Fig.: Brevity, conciseness.

"For the sake of condensity we have cancelled the portion of manuscript containing them."—Cowden Clarke: Shakesp. Character, p. 157.

ōōn'-dēr, s. [Eng. *cond (q.v.); -er.]

1. A man posted on a height to give notice of the approach of shoals of fish.

"Condors... stand upon high places near the sea coast, at the time of kerring fishing, to make signs to the fishers which way the shoals passeth, which may better appear to such as stand upon some high cliff, by a kind of blue colour that the fish casteth in the water, than to those in the ships. These be likewise called Auers, by likelihood of the French Auver, exclaimers, and talkers."—Oweel.

2. Naut.: One who gives directions to the helmsman of a ship how to steer.

ōōn'-dēs-çēnçes, s. [A contr. form of condescendence (q.v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: Condescendence, affability.

"Which passage I find cited by Cressie's Answer to Dr. Pierce, adding thus, See the condescendence of this great king."—Fuller: Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng., p. 440.

2. Scots Law: That part of a law case in which the plaintiff or pursuer sets forth his case.

ōōn'-dēs-çēnd', *con-dis-çēnd, *condys-çēnd, v.t. & i. [Fr. condescendre, from Lat. con = cum = with, together, and descendo = to come down, to descend.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To agree, to acquiesce or assent.

"The committee of estates at Edinburgh... condescended with the laird of Invercauld, for a certain sum of money..."—Spalding, l. 291.

2. To stoop, yield, submit, or become subject.

"Can they think me so broken, so debas'd, With corporal servitude, that my mind ever Will condescend to such absurd commands?" Milton: Sam. Agon., 1827.

3. To stoop or lower one's self voluntarily to terms of equality with an inferior; to be affable or courteous.

"... condescend to men of low estate."—Rom. xii. 16.

4. To vouchsafe, deign, or agree to anything.

"When solitary Nature condescends To mimic Time's forlorn humilities." Wordsworth: Miscel. Sonnets.

5. To specify, to particularise (followed by the prep. upon). (Scott.)

"Men do not condescend upon what would satisfy them..."—Guthrie's Trial, p. 71.

6. To fix one's thoughts or affections; to settle.

"And when that he on hire was condescended, Him thought his choice it might not him amended." Chaucer: The Marchantes Tale, 9, 470.

*B. Trans.: To agree, to arrange, to bargain.

"For keeping the proportion due by the burgh, it is condescended, that..."—Information, A. 1640, Spalding, l. 208.

ōōn'-dēs-çēn'-dēnçes, s. [Fr. condescendance; Ital. condescendenza, from Low Lat. condescenduntia, from condescendo.]

1. A voluntary submission or giving way to an inferior; condescension.

"... St. Paul's condescendence to the capacities he wrote unto..."—W. Mountague: Devout Essays, p. 81. (1648.)

2. A specification of particulars.

"I'll take a day to see and answer ever, article of your condescendence, and then I'll hold you to confess or deny, as accords."—Scott: Heart of Midloth., ch. v.

* con-dēs-gēn'-dēn-gŷ, s. [Eng. condescendē(e); -ŷ.] Condescension, courtesy, affability.

"The respect and condescendency which you have already shown me is that, for which I can never make any suitable return."—Boyle: Works, vol. vi, p. 610. Lett. from Dr. Astry.

con-dēs-gēn'-dīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONDESCEND.]

A. As pr. par.: (In senses corresponding to those of the verb).

B. As adjective:

1. Courteous, kind.

"A man, whom marks of condescending grace Teach, while they flatter him, his proper place."—Cowper: Retirement.

2. Specifying, particularising.

"That universal conviction, if I may call it so, is not general. . . . but it is particular and condescending. . . ."—Guthrie's Trials, p. 97.

C. As subst.: Condescension.

"This queen of most familiar condescensions is content to be our every week's prospect."—Hammond: Works, iv, 525.

con-dēs-gēn'-dīng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. condescendingly; -lŷ.] In a condescending manner; by way of voluntary yielding or submission; courteously. (Hen. More.)

con-dēs-gēn'-sion, s. [Lat. condescensio.] A voluntary descending or lowering one's self from a position of higher rank or dignity to an equality with an inferior; courtesy, affability, deference.

"At the same time he neglected no art of condescension by which the love of the multitude could be conciliated."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 11.

¶ For the difference between condescension and complaisance see COMPLAISANCE.

* con-dēs-gēn'-sive, a. [Ital. condescensivo.] Inclined to condescension; condescending, courteous, affable.

" . . . if we consider the condescensive tenderness, . . ."—Barrow, vol. i, Ser. 8.

* con-dēs-gēnt', s. [CONDESCEND.] An act of condescension or courtesy.

"Some worthy person that can deny himself in stooping to such a condescend."—Worthington, to Harbord (1661), Ep. 17.

* con-det, * con-dyt, s. [CONDUCT, s.] A safe-conduct, a passport.

"Set on his cloak a con-dyt for to see, The Lyon in wax that euld his condet be."—Wallace, xl, 912. MS.

* con-dethe, s. [CONDUIT.]

"Withe condethes fulle curious."—Morte Arthure, 200.

* con-diot, s. [CONDUIT.]

con-dic-tion, s. [Lat. condictio = (1) the proclamation of a festival, (2) in the jurists, a demand of restitution; condico = to speak with: con = together, and dico = to say.]

Law: A repetition. (Wharton.)

con-did'-dle, v.t. [Pref. con-, and didde.] To purloin. (Halliwell gives it as a Devonshire word.) (Scott: St. Ronan's Well, ch. iv.)

con-dign (g silent), a. [O. Fr. condigne; Lat. condignus.]

1. Worthy, adequate. (Sir T. Elyot: The Governour, fo. 76.)

2. Worthy, well deserved or merited; suitable (particularly used with the word punishment.) (Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.)

* con-dig-ni-tŷ, s. [O. Fr. condignité, from Lat. condignus.]

1. Merit, deserving, deserts (chiefly used by theologians).

"Such a worthiness of condignity, and proper merit of the heavenly glory, cannot be found in any the best, most perfect, and excellent of created beings."—Bp. Bull: Works, i, 364.

2. Equal merit or dignity.

* con-dign-lŷ (g silent), * con-dygne-lŷ, adv. [Eng. condignly; -lŷ.]

1. Worthily, deservedly, by merit.

2. In a condign or merited manner; deservedly.

* con-dign-nēss (g silent), s. [Eng. condign; -ness.] The quality of being according to merits or deserts; suitability.

con-dī-mēnt, s. [Lat. condimentum, from condio = to pickle, to preserve, to season.] A seasoning or sauce; anything used to excite the appetite by communicating a pungent taste to food with which it is mixed. The principal condiments are salt, mustard, pepper, vinegar, pickles, horse-radish, curry-powder, nutmegs, cloves, &c. Many of these not only assist digestion, but, by tempting the palate, increase the amount of food consumed, and thus stimulate a flagging appetite. Condiments must, however, be used with moderation, or their action on the digestive organs may become injurious.

con-dī-mēnt'-al, a. Pertaining to, or like a condiment; appetizing.

* con-dis-cend, * con-dy-cend, v. [CONDESCEND.]

* con-dīs-cī-ple, s. [Fr., from Lat. condiscipulus: con = cum = with, together, and discipulus = a disciple (q.v.).] A fellow-disciple; a learner or pupil in the same school, a schoolfellow.

"A condisciple of his, or one that had been, hearing so much of the man, went to him."—Merio Cassaubon: Of Credulity and Incredulity, p. 114.

* con-dise, s. pl. [CONDUIT.]

"Myrthe had done come through condises."—Rom. of Rose.

* con-dite, s. [CONDUIT, CONDUIT.]

"Saus condite vs gyus."—Langstaf, p. 290.

* con-dite (1), v.t. [CONDUIT, v.]

"Ye shall offer them to condite out of the londe."—Merlin, i. ll. 80.

* con-dite (2), v.t. [CONDITS, a.]

1. Lit.: To season, pickle, or preserve with spices, salts, &c.

"The most innocent of them are but like condited or pickled mushrooms. . . ."—Taylor: Rules of Living Holy.

2. Fig.: To preserve the memory of.

"A good fame is the best odor, and a good name is a precious ointment which will condite our bodies best, and preserve our memories to all eternity."—Paradoxical Assertions, p. 44 (1699).

* con'-dite, a. [Lat. conditus, pa. par. of condio = to pickle, to preserve, to season.] Preserved, seasoned, or pickled.

"Scotely would fain have used all summer the condite flowers of saucory, strawberry water, &c."—Burton: Anat. of Mel, p. 502.

* con-dī-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONDITE, v.]

* con-dīte-mēnt, s. [Eng. condite; -ment.]

1. Lit.: A condiment; a composition of conserves, powders, and spices in the form of an electuary. (Bailey.)

2. Fig.: A mingling or mixture; a flavour, a taste.

"A scholar can have no taste of natural philosophy, without some condiment of the mathematics."—Bishop Hacket: Life of Archbp. Williams, pt. 1, p. 10.

* con-dī-tīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONDITE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act or process of preserving, pickling, or seasoning.

"Much after the same manner as the sugar doth, in the conditing of pears, quinces, and the like."—Grew: Museum.

con-dī-tion, * con-di-ci-on, s. [Fr. condition; Sp. condicion; from Lat. condicio (and at a later period conditio) = a compact, a bargain; cf. condico = to talk a thing over, from con = cum = with, together, and dico = to say.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality, state, circumstances, or external characteristics of anything.

"The hals herd me specify the condicions of purgatory."—Hampole, 2, 964.

2. An attribute, property, or accident.

"It seemed to us a condition and property of Divine Powers and Beings, to be hidden and unseen to others."—Bacon.

3. Mental or moral qualities, properties, or attributes; character, temperament, temper.

"I cannot believe that in her; she is full of most blessed condition."—Shakesp.: Othello, ii. 1.

4. Manners, conduct, or behaviour; mode of life.

"And it is oftentimes seen that dyners, whiche before they came in autorite, were of good & virtuous condicions, being in their prosperitie were vicerly changed. . . ."—Sir T. Elyot: Governour, bk. li, ch. 11.

5. The circumstances or position of things under which anything is done or exists.

"It seems pretty clear that organs being must be exposed during several generations to the new conditions of life to cause any appreciable amount of variation. . . ."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1869), ch. i., p. 7.

6. The state, position, rank, or circumstances in life.

"The king himself met with many entertainments, at the charge of particular men, which had been rarely practised till then by the persons of the best condition."—Clarendon.

7. The state of preservation, health, or existence; plight, quality. [III., 4, 5.]

8. That on which anything depends; a pre-existing state of things requisite in order that something else may take effect.

9. A stipulation, article of agreement; terms of a covenant or bargain.

"10. A writing containing the articles or terms of an agreement; a compact, a bond.

" . . . such term or terms as are Express'd in the condition, . . ."—Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Law:

(1) A restraint annexed to anything, by conforming to which one will gain advantage, and by departing from which he will suffer loss.

(2) Anything contingent on an occurrence which may or may not take place.

¶ Conditions are of many kinds, as conditions precedent, subsequent, inherent, collateral, &c. For these see the special phrases under III., and the words with which condition is coupled.

2. Math.: [III., 3.]

3. Vet.: [III., 4, 5.]

III. In special phrases & compounds:

1. Condition in deed:

Law: A condition expressly mentioned in that special one on performance of which the estate can be held, and on breach of which the grantee can claim it back again.

2. Conditions of sale:

Law: The terms under which property is offered for sale; also the instrument containing these terms.

3. Equation of conditions:

Math.: Certain equations in the integral calculus,  $\int =$  useful in ascertaining whether a proposed fluxion will admit of finite integration or a finite fluent. (Crabb.)

4. In condition:

Vet.: In a good state of health, strength, and training.

5. Out of condition:

Vet.: Not in a good state of health, strength, and training.

condition powder, s.

Vet.: A tonic mixture administered to horses and cattle. Its action is chiefly as a stomachic.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between condition and station: "Condition has most relation to the circumstances, education, birth, and the like; station refers rather to the rank, occupation, or mode of life which one pursues. Riches suddenly acquired are calculated to make a man forget his original condition, and to render him negligent of the duties of his station. The condition of men in reality is often so different from what it appears, that it is extremely difficult to form an estimate of what they are, or what they have been. It is the folly of the present day, that every man is unwilling to keep the station which has been assigned to him by Providence: the rage for equality destroys every just distinction in society; the low aspire to be, in appearance, at least, equal with their superiors; and those in elevated stations do not hesitate to put themselves on a level with their inferiors." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

For the difference between condition and situation, see SITUATION.

con-dī-tion, * con-dy-cyon, v.t. & t. [CONDUIT, s.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To agree on, to contract, to stipulate or bargain.

"It was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn should put to death all his male children."—Raleigh: Hist. Eng.

2. To impose or invest with conditions.

3. To bring into and keep in a good state of health.

condi-tion-ā-l, a. & s. [Lat. conditionalis, from conditio.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Containing, implying, or depending on certain conditions; made with limitations or reservations; not absolute.

"For the use we have his express commandment, for the effect his conditional promise. . . ."—Booker.

II. Technically:

1. Law: There may be conditional legacies, conditional pardons, &c.

2. Gram.: Expressing a condition or dependent clause.

"Hypothetical, conditional, concessive, and exceptive conjunctions seem in general to require a subjunctive mood after them."—Bishop Louth: English Grammar.

3. Logic: Expressing a condition or supposition.

"All hypothetical propositions, therefore, though disjunctive in form, are conditional in meaning; and the words hypothetical and conditional may be, as indeed they generally are, used synonymously."—J. S. Mill: System of Logic, I. iv. § 2.

B. As subst.: A limitation, reservation, or condition.

"This case seems somewhat an hard case both in respect of the conditional, and in respect of the other words. But for the conditional it seemeth the Judges of that time . . . thought it was a dangerous thing to admit 'ifs and ands, to qualifie words of treason. . . ."—Bacon: Hen. VII., p. 134.

¶ (1) Conditional fee:

Law: A fee restrained to particular heirs exclusive of others, and which, on the failure of those to whom it was limited, reverted to the feudal grantee.

(2) Conditional limitation:

Law: A limitation which allows a stranger to come into possession of an estate on fulfillment of certain conditions. Of old this was illegal, but now it is permitted and is frequent.

* condi-tion-āl-i-tĭ, s. [Eng. conditional; -ity.] The quality or state of being conditional or limited; limitation by certain events.

"And as this clear proposal of the promises may inspire our endeavors, so is the conditionality most efficacious to necessitate and engage them."—Decay of Piety.

* condi-tion-āl-ly, adv. [Eng. conditional; -ly.] By way of, or subject to, certain conditions or limitations; not absolutely or positively.

" . . . liberty and reason are conditionally resigned by every poor man in every society. . . ."—Goldsmith: Essays, II.

* condi-tion-āte, a. [Low Lat. conditionatus, pa. par. of conditio, from Lat. conditio.] Arranged on, or subject to, certain conditions or terms; conditional.

"That which is mistaken to be particular and absolute, duly understood, is general, but conditionate; and belongs to none who shall not perform the condition."—Hammond.

* condi-tion-āte, v.t. [CONDITIONATE, a.]

1. To qualify, to regulate. " . . . the two ideas conditionate one another."—Strauss: Life of Jesus, transl. (1866), § 148.

2. To put under conditions. "That ivy ariseth where it may be supported, we cannot ascribe the same unto any science therein, which suspends and conditionates its eruption."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

* condi-tion-āt-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CONDITIONATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: A putting under conditions, an arrangement, a condition.

"Were these arts or acts any whit the better for these conditionings and conditioningings so pre-requird?"—Gault: Mag. Astro-mancer, p. 114.

condi-tion-ed, pa. par. & a. [CONDITION, v.]

A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As participial adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Having qualities of a certain kind, good or bad. Generally preceded by an adverb indicating what these qualities are. They may be with or without a hyphen; &s, best conditioned, ill-conditioned.

"The dearest friend to me, the kindest man, The best condition'd."—Shokeep: Merchant of Venice, III. 2.

2. Metaphysics:

(1) Having conditions or relations. (Chiefly used as the opposite to unconditioned = absolute.)

"The mind is restricted to think in certain forms; and under these thought is possible only in the conditioned interval between two unconditioned contradictory extremes or poles, each of which is altogether inconceivable, but of which, on the principle of the excluded middle, the one or the other is necessarily true."—Sir W. Hamilton: Discussions on Philosophy and Literature, p. 591.

(2) Construction (with the definite article, substantival).

"The field is thus open for the last theory, which would analyse the judgment of causality into the form of the mental law of the conditioned."—Sir W. Hamilton: Discussions on Philosophy and Literature, p. 591.

"Tapres make and condle lyhte."—Kelyng. Ahtq., l. 263.

† con-dō-la-tōr-ĭ, a. [Eng. condole(e); -atory.] Expressing or tending to condolence or sympathy; sympathizing. (Smart.)

condōle, v.t. & i. [Lat. condoleo = to grieve with: con = cum = with, together, and dolo = to grieve; dolor = grief; Fr. condoloire; Ital. condolere; Sp. condolar.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To mourn, to grieve, to lament.

" . . . this made him again recall the vanity of his sleeping to his remembrance; and thus he began again to condole with himself."—Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress, pt. I.

2. To mourn, grieve, or lament with another; to sympathize or commiserate.

"Your friends would have cause to rejoice, rather than condole with you."—Sir W. Temple.

B. Trans.: To lament over or bewail with another.

* con-dōle-mēt, s. [Eng. condole; -ment.] 1. The act of condoling or sympathizing with another.

" . . . an address of condolence for the loss of his queen. . . ."—Life of A. Wood, p. 390.

2. Grief, mourning, or sorrow; lamentation. "To do obsequious sorrow; But to persevere In obstinate condemnation. . . ."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, I. 2.

condōlence, * con-dōle-ānce, s. [Fr. condolance, from Lat. condolens, pr. par. of condoleo.] The expression of grief or sorrow for the troubles or misfortunes of others; sympathy.

" . . . a special mission of condolence and congratulation."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

¶ For the difference between condolence and sympathy, see SYMPATHY.

condō-lēr, s. [Eng. condole(e); -er.] One who condoles or sympathizes with the sorrow of another.

condō-līng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONDOLA.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adj.: Sympathizing.

"A lover is more condoling."—Shakespeare: Mid. Night's Dream, I. 2.

C. As subst.: The act of expressing sympathy with another; condolence.

"Why should I think that all that devout multitude, which so lately cried Hosanna in the streets, did not also cheer their part in these public condolingings."—Ep. Hall: Contempl., The Crucifixion.

condō-nā-tion, s. [Lat. condonatio, from condono = . . . to pardon: con = cum = with, together, and dono = to give; donum = a gift.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of condoning, forgiving, or pardoning.

2. Law: The forgiving by a husband of his wife, or by a wife of her husband, for any breach of marital duty, with an implied understanding or condition that it shall not be repeated.

condō-ne, v.t. & i. [Lat. condono = to forgive.]

A. Transitive.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To forgive, to pardon.

"In the numerous cases where a fine appears as a composition for a breach of law, we are not to assume that every offence might be condoned for a certain sum in money. . . ."—C. H. Pearson: The Early and Middle Ages of England, ch. xxxiii.

2. Used loosely in the sense of atone or compensate for.

"There was a certain vague earnestness of belief about him which qualified and condoned the absurd and sometimes [ocular] looks of his father."—Black: Madcap Violet, ch. xxxiii.

II. Law: To forgive or overlook a breach of marital duty.

† B. Intrans.: To atone or compensate for.

condōr, s. [Sp., &c., condor, from Ineq (Peruvian Indian) cuntur = the bird defined below.]

Ornith.: A magnificent vulture, Sarco, rampus or Sarcorhamphus gryphus, which floats with outstretched and motionless wings in airy circles on the higher parts of the Andes, reaching at times the tremendous elevation of 21,000 ft. above the sea-level. The older travellers, as was their wont, exaggerated its size, strength, and ferocity, and it figured as the Western counterpart of the mythical roc described by the Arabs, and by some credited with the ability "to truss an elephant." Humboldt and Bonpland dissipated these illusions. The former great naturalist met with none the expansion of whose wings exceeded 9 ft. Some of 11 ft. have been said to be met with, and one of 14 ft. Humboldt found that a male condor, the expanse of whose wings was 9 ft., measured 3 ft. 3 in. from the tip of the bill to the extremity of the tail. The male condor has a comb on its head. Both sexes have a ruff round their necks. Their bodies are usually deep black, with a tinge of grey; the wing coverts in the males are white, at least at the tips; the legs are bluish grey. Strange to say, children are reputed to be in no danger from it, though two condors will attack the vicuña, the heifer, and even the puma. The species is found in most parts of the Andes, especially in Peru and Chili. There is one in the Zoological Gardens in Regent's Park—a sorry bird compared with the mythic condor of pre-scientific times.

condōt-tĭ-ĕ-rĕ (pl. cōn-dōt-tĭ-ĕ-rĭ), s. [Ital. = a captain, a carrier, a mercenary leader, from condotta = conduct, command, prudence, wisdom, carriage. Cognate with the Lat. and Eng. word conductor.]

Hist., &c.: A soldier of fortune, a military leader, who sold his own sword and those of his followers to the highest bidder, regardless of the justice of the cause for which he and they fought.

¶ It was in Italy that the practice began of employing condottiere. In 1225 Genoa engaged 200 of them, led by the Dukes of Savoy; and in 1282 Florence hired 500 French, and other States followed the example. The practice received a great impulse about the beginning of the fourteenth century, when the petty Italian princes and republics began to commute the military services which their subjects had hitherto rendered for money, for both a military veld was thus created and means were obtained to fill it by engaging condottieri. In 1342 the cities formed a league to suppress them. But there was occupation for them outside Italy. Large bodies of them took part in the war between Edward III. of England and France, and when the peace of Bretigny, in 1360, terminated their occupation, they fought and plundered on their own account, becoming a terrible scourge to France. They were called free companies, or simply companies or free lances, and numbered about 40,000 fighting men, all heavily armed cavalry. Finally they were transferred to Castile, on their way levying a contribution on the Pope at Avignon. They were an insatiably rapacious race, and so faithless that they were feared by friends as well as foes. They had no scruple about any amount of cruelty, but finding ultimately that it was more advantageous to avoid slaying their foes and simply to capture them unhurt with the view of demanding a heavy ransom, they aimed at making their battles bloodless. Sir John Hawkwood, an Englishman buried at Florence in 1393 with great honour by the citizens, is held to have been one of the last condottieri properly so called.

cón-dród-íte, a. [CHONDRODITE.]

cón-duce, v. t. & i. [Lat. conducere = to lead together; con = cum = with; duco = to lead; Sp. conducir; Fr. conduire; Port. conduzir; Ital. condurre, condurre.]

A. Intransitive:
1. To contribute to or promote a result; to further, to tend to; to advance or promote (followed by to, unto, or towards).

"He was sensible how much such an union would conduce to the happiness of both. . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xlii.

* 2. To lead, to guide.
"As if works could no way conduce into the attaining of salvation but by way of merit and desert. . . ."—Mede: Works, bk. i., dia. 40.

B. Transitive:
1. To lead, to conduct, to guide, to accompany.

"He was sent to conduct hither the princess Henrietta Maria."—Wotton.

2. To hire, to engage.
"As he the persuasion of flatterers, he conducted many wicked tyrants out of all countries to depend upon him."—Piscott: Chron. l. 18.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to conduce and to contribute: "To conduce signifies to serve the full purpose; to contribute signifies only to be a subordinate instrument; the former is always taken in a good sense, the latter in a bad or good sense. Exercise conduces to the health; it contributes to give vigour to the frame. Nothing conduces more to the wellbeing of any community than a spirit of subordination among all ranks and classes. A want of firmness and vigilance in the government or magistrates contributes greatly to the spread of disaffection and rebellion. Schemes of ambition never conduce to tranquillity of mind. A single failure may contribute sometimes to involve a person in perpetual trouble." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) cón-duce-mént, s. [Eng. conduce; -ment.] The act of conducting; tendency, disposition, drift.

"The conductment of all this is but chaballical."—Gregory: Works, p. 68.

cón-dū-çent, a. [Lat. conducens, pr. par. of conducere] Conducting, contributing, helping, or tending.

" . . . any other act fitting or conducive to the good success of this business."—Abp. Laud: Hist. of His Chanc. at Ox., p. 141.

cón-dū-çer, s. [Eng. conducive; -er.] One who hires or engages. (Scottish.)

" . . . he that is hired and reuder agane to the conductor the halli byre that he was conducit for. . . ."—Halsfour: Pract., p. 617.

cón-dū-çí-bíl-í-tý, s. [Eng. conducibility; -ity.] The quality of being conducive; capability of being conducted or turned.

"Duties, as deriving their obligation from their conducibility to the promoting of our chief end. . . ."—Wilkins: Of Nat. Relig., bk. I., ch. xlv.

cón-dū-çí-ble, a. & s. [Lat. conducibilis, from conducere.]

A. As adj.: Having the power or quality of conducting; tending, contributing, furthering, conducive.

"To both, the medium which is most propitious and conducible, is air."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

B. As subst.: Anything which conduces, promotes, or tends to an end.

"Those motions of generations and corruptions, and of the conducibles thereunto, are wisely and admirably ordered and contemporized by the rector of all things."—Hale.

cón-dū-çí-ble-něss, s. [Eng. conducible; -ness.] The quality of being conducive; conducibility. (More.) † cón-dū-çí-bly, adv. [Eng. conducibil(e); -ly.] In a manner tending to conduce, further, or promote.

cón-dū-çing, pr. par., a., & s. [CONDUCE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adj.: Furthering, promoting, or tending to; conducive.

" . . . all other approaches, conducing to convenience or pleasure. . . ."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. I., ch. v.

C. As substantive:
1. The act or condition of furthering, promoting, or tending to.

"I have taken [muche travel] for the conducing and setting forth of good amitie & peace betwene your highnes and her son."—State Papers; Wolsey to Henry VIII., anno 1547.

* 2. The act of hiring or engaging; hire.
"For the conducing & vaging of aue hundred men of weir."—Aberk. Reg., A. 1548, V. 20.

cón-dū-çíve, a. [Eng. conduce; -ive.] Having the power or quality of conducting, furthering, or promoting; tending to further or promote.

"An action, however conductive to the good of our country. . . ."—Addison: Freeholder.

† cón-dū-çíve-něss, s. [Eng. conducive; -ness.] The quality of being conducive; tendency to further or promote.

"I mention some examples of the conduciveness of the smallness of a body's parts to its fluidity."—Boyle.

cón-duct, s. [Low Lat. conductus = a guard, an escort; Lat. conductus, pr. par. of conducere = to lead with, to conduct; con = cum = with, and duco = to lead; dux = a leader, & guide; Fr. conduite; Sp. conducto.]

I. Literally:
1. The act of leading or conducting; guidance.
"And follow me, that will to some provision Give this quick conduct."—Shakespeare: King Lear, III. 4.

2. The act or science of leading an army; generalship.
"Conduct of armies is a prince's art."—Wallier.

3. A guide or leader.
"Come, gentlemen, I will be your conduct."—B. Jonson: Every Man out of His Humour.

4. A convoy, guard, or escort.
"His majesty, Tending my person's safety, hath appointed This conduct to convey me to the Tower."—Shakespeare: Richard III., I. 1.

5. A warrant or security for one's safe passage; a safe-conduct (q.v.).

" . . . all merchants of what nation soever, shall have safe conduct to pass and repass with their merchandise into England."—Hackluyt: Voyages, vol. I., p. 129.

* 6. That which leads, carries, or conveys anything; a conduit, a channel.
"Likewise by the sayd clatene there is drinke conveyed thorow certain pipes and conducts. . . ."—Hackluyt: Voyages, vol. II., pt. I., p. 61.

* 7. Conduct-money (q.v.).
"Not he who takes up armes for cote and conduct."—Milton: Areopag., p. 50.

II. Figuratively:
* 1. Management, direction.
"Young men, in the conduct and managa of actions."—Bacon.

* 2. Sharpness, cleverness, or skill in the management of matters.
"Is usable to comprehend how an extreme want of conduct and discretion can consist with the abilities I have allowed him."—Letters of Junius, No. 54.

3. Behaviour, mode of action, deportment.
"All these difficulties were increased by the conduct of Shrewsbury."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

* 4. Regularity or exactness of life; exact behaviour.
"Though all regard for reputation is not quite laid aside, it is so low, that very few think virtue and conduct of absolute necessity for preserving it."—Burft.

* 5. A channel, passage, or means of communication.

"God is the fountain of honour, and the conduct, by which he conveys it to the sons of men, are virtuous and generous practices."—South, vol. I., Sermon.

* conduct-money, s.
1. Hist.: An exaction levied by Charles I. to pay the travelling expenses of his troops.

"Allow him coat and conduct-money."—Butler: Characters: The Herald.

2. Law: Money paid to a witness for his travelling expenses. (Wharton.)

¶ For the difference between conduct and behaviour, see BEHAVIOUR.

* con-duct, pa. par., a., & s. [CONDUCE.]

A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adj.: Hired.

C. As substantive:
1. One who is hired, a workman.

2. A chaplain, a hired priest. The term is still applied at Eton to the chaplains who conduct Divine service.

cón-duct, v. t. & i. [CONDUCT, a.]

A. Transitive:
I. Literally:
(1) To lead, guide, direct, or accompany on the way.
"And Judah came to Gilgal, to go to meet the king, to conduct the king over Jordan."—2 Sam. xiv. 12.

(2) To usher in, to lead or bring to one's presence with ceremony.
"Pray receive them nobly, and conduct them into our presence."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., I. 4.

* (3) To lead, direct, or head, as an army.
"Cortes himself conducted the third and smallest division."—Robertson: History of America.

2. Fig.: To manage, to direct, to control, to regulate.
"Having explained the general scheme and formation of the argument, I may be permitted to subjoin a brief account of the manner of conducting it."—Paley: Horæ Paulinæ, ch. I.

3. Mus.: To lead, to direct, as a choir or orchestra.

4. Phys.: To carry, to convey, as heat, &c.

B. Reflexive: To carry oneself, to behave, to act.

C. Intransitive:
1. Phys.: To act as a conductor of heat, &c.
"Carbon, in general, conducts better or worse according to the manner in which it has been prepared."—De la Rive: Treatise on Electricity, pt. I., ch. I.; translation.

2. Mus.: To act as conductor of a choir or orchestra in the performance of a musical composition.
"We need not stay to applaud the orchestra for excellent work. Mr. Whiting for judicious use of the organ, or Sir Michael Costa for conducting, which was a model of clearness, firmness, and tact."—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 14, 1881.

3. Fig.: To behave, to conduct one's self, to act. (American.) (Webster.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to conduct, to guide, and to lead: "The first two of these terms convey, according to their real import, an idea of superior intelligence, which is not implied by the latter: on the other hand, this includes an idea of credit and ascendancy altogether unknown to the others. We conduct or guide those who do not know the road; we lead those who either cannot or will not go alone. In the literal sense it is the head that conducts, the eye that guides, and the hand that leads. One conducts a lawsuit; one guides a traveller; one leads an infant. In the figurative sense the understanding conducts; rule guides; the will or influence leads. Intelligence ought to conduct us in business; politeness ought to guide our behaviour in company; taste may lead us in the choice of pleasures. We are conducted in a certain course, that we may do what is proper to be done; we are guided in a certain route, that we may not go astray; we are led into society from a sociable temper. A general conducts an army according to his knowledge and experience; he is himself guided in what he does by fixed rules; he leads his army into the field of battle by the word of command. The pilot conducts the vessel; the steersman guides it; the coachman guides his horses on the road; he leads them into the stable." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

He thus discriminates between to conduct, to manage, and to direct: "Conducting requires most wisdom and knowledge; managing most action; direction most authority. A lawyer conducts the cause entrusted to him; a steward manages the mercantile concerns for his employer; a superintendent directs the movements of all the subordinate agents. Conducting is always applied to affairs of the first importance; management is a term of familiar use to characterize familiar employment; direction makes up in authority what it wants in importance; it falls but little short of the word conduct. A conductor conceives and plans; a manager acts or executes; a director commands." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

con-duc-ta, s. [Sp.] A train or convey of valuable freight. (Webster.)

con-duc-ted, pa. par. or a. [CONDUCT, v.]

A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Guided, led, directed.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Managed, carried out.

(2) Behaved, having manners of a certain kind. Used in compounds; as, well-conducted, badly-conducted.

II. Physics: Applied to heat conveyed from one body to another by conduction.

"Conducted heat may be derived from either dry or moist substances, and its effects vary somewhat as it comes from the one or the other of these sources."—Fereix: Elements of Materia Medica and Therapeutics, pt. 14.

con-duc-ti-bil-i-ty, s. [Eng. conduct, and suff. -ability; Fr. conductibilité.]

Physics:

I. Properly: Ability to be conducted. (Used of heat or electricity.) Not the same as CONDUCTIVITY (q.v.).

2. Sometimes, though less properly, used in the same sense as conductivity, i. e., for the ability to conduct. (Used of heat or electricity.)

con-duc-ti-ble, a. [Fr. conductible.]

Physics:

1. Properly: Able or suited to be conducted. (Used of heat or electricity.)

2. Less Properly: Capable of conducting. (Used of heat or electricity.)

con-duc-ting, pr. par. & a. [CONDUCT, v.]

conducting cells, s. pl.

Bot.: For definition see extract.

"To many Vascular Cryptogams, Gymnosperms and Menosphytes, as well as in a few Dicotyledons, rows of vascular cells are found in places where from the analogy of other plants one would expect to find vessels, the partition-walls not having become absorbed. Such structures compose what is called a conducting tissue, and the separate cells are not called vascular, but conducting cells."—Thomé: Botany (transl. by Bennett), 3rd ed. (1879), p. 48.

conducting tissue, s.

Bot.: Tissue composed of conducting cells (q.v.).

con-duc-tion, *con-duc-ti-oun, *con-duc-ti-oune, s. [Lat. conductio = a bringing together, a hiring; conducio = to bring together, to hire.] [CONDUCT.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. The act of leading or guiding.

"Hoab the son of Raguel the Midianite who assisted the Israelites, in their conduction thro' the wilderness of Pharan."—Baleph: Hist. World, bk. 1, ch. viii., § 12.

2. The act of hiring or engaging for wages.

"Teaching the conductors & ferry of the men-stralia. . . .—Aberd. Reg., A. 1888, v. 10.

II. Figuratively:

1. The act of training up or educating; training, education.

"Every man has his beginning and conduction."—B. Jonson: Case is altered.

2. Skill, experience, capacity, especially in warfare.

"Then grew the fame of Sertorius to be so great, that even in Rome itself he was thought to be the noblest captain, and of best conduction of any man in his time."—North: Plutarch, p. 408.

B. Physics:

1. The passage of heat through any body, or of electricity over its entire surface.

"We shall first consider the transmission of heat by conduction."—Ganot (trans. by Atkinson): 3rd ed., § 848.

2. The property possessed by certain bodies of transmitting heat through them or electricity over their entire surface.

con-duc-tiv-i-ous, a. [Lat. conductivus, from conducio = . . . to hire.] Hired, serving for wages.

"The persons were neither titularios nor perpetual curates, but entirely conductivus, and removable at pleasure."—Aylife.

con-duc-tive, a. [Eng. conduct; -ive.]

Physics: Having the power or quality of conducting.

con-duc-tiv-i-ty, s. [Eng. conductive; -ty; connective; and suff. -ity.]

1. Heat: The power of conducting or transmitting heat from particle to particle of a body, so as to pass through its mass. [CONDUCTIO.]

"Conductivity is the quantity of heat that passes in unit time, through unit area of a plate whose thickness is unity, when its opposite faces differ in temperature by one degree."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units (ed. 1878), ch. 1x, p. 42.

2. Elect.: The property of acquiring and propagating over the whole extent of its surface the electricity derived from any electrified body with which it may be brought in contact. [CONDUCTOR.]

"The conductivity of a given wire or conductor is the reciprocal of its resistance."—Jenkin: Electricity and Magnetism, ch. xvi., § 4.

¶ (1) Conductivity and conductivity are sometimes used as synonymous terms, but if etymology be regarded the first of these should be used in a passive sense, and the second in an active one.

(2) With regard to electric currents conductivity and resistance are the opposites of each other.

con-duc-tor, s. [Lat., Prov., Sp., & Port. conductor; Fr. conducteur.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A guide, a leader.

" . . . that he may be our conductor the rest of the way."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. II.

2. A chief or leader of an army; a general, a commander.

"Who is conductor of his people?"—Shakesp.: King Lear, iv. 7.

* 3. A guide, director, or manager.

"None will deny him to have been the chief conductor."—Addison.

II. Technically:

1. Railway and coach traffic: The official who has charge of an omnibus, street-car, or railroad train, whether for passengers or freight.

¶ In England the official in charge of a railway passenger train is known as a guard (q.v.).

2. Music:

(1) A director or leader of an orchestra or chorus. It is supposed that a leader or a fugueman was employed by the Assyrians, to regulate the rhythm of the song or dances; he was armed with two sticks, one of which he beat against the other, and so marked the time or accent. (Stainer and Barrett.)

(2) The inventor or leader of a chime or change in bell-ringing. (Stainer and Barrett.)

* 3. Surg.: (For definition see extract.)

"Conductor, in surgery, [is] an instrument the use of which is to direct the knife in certain operations. It is more commonly called a director."—Hooper: Med. Dict.

4. Heat: Anything which is capable of transmitting heat through its mass from particle to particle.

(1) Bad conductor: A body which transmits heat slowly and imperfectly. A blanket is a bad conductor of heat: used for a covering at night it prevents the heat generated by the person sleeping from escaping into the external atmosphere; employed to roll up ice it impedes the passage of the warmer external air to the congealed body, and keeps the latter from soon melting. The resins, glass, wood, and especially liquids and gases are other bad conductors of heat.

(2) Good conductor: A body which readily transmits heat through it. The metals are high in this respect, the leading ones being arranged in the following order:—(a) (highest) platinum, (b) silver, (c) copper, (d) iron, (e) zinc, (f) tin, (g) lead.

5. Elect.: A body which acquires and propagates electricity over its whole surface when brought in contact with an electrified body. As in the case of heat, there are good and bad conductors of electricity. Metals are good conductors, and in the following order:—(a) (highest) silver, (b) copper, (c) gold, (d) aluminium, (e) sodium, (f) zinc, (g) cadmium, (h) potassium, (i) platinum, (j) iron, (k) tin,

(l) lead, (m) German silver, (n) antimony, (o) mercury, (p) bismuth. Liquids, on the contrary, are bad conductors of electricity.

¶ Equivalent conductors of electricity: Conductors which offer an equal resistance to the passage of an electric current, and which might be substituted for each other in any voltaic circuit without altering its intensity. (Ganot.)

con-duc-tor-ry, s. [Eng. conductor; -ry.]

Having the power or quality of conducting; conductive.

con-duc-tress, s. [Eng. conductor; -ess.] A woman who conducts; a female guide, a directress.

"A good housewife, and a very prudent and diligent conductress of her family."—Johnson: Letter to Mrs. Thrale, 1778.

con-duc-tre, *coundie, v. t. [Fr. conduire.] [CONDUCT, v.] To conduct, to guide.

"Coundie hym by the downe."—Goswain, 1971.

con-duc-t, *con-dit, *con-dite, *con-duyt, *con-dythe, *con-duyte, *con-dyt, *con-dute, *con-dyth, s. [O. Fr. conduit; Fr. conduit; Sp. conductor; Port. conduta; Ital. condotto; Low Lat. & Lat. conductor, from conducio = to lead, to conduct.] [CONDUCT.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

* 1. The act of conducting or guiding; guidance.

"The messengers went, conduite he did thann hana."—Langtoft, p. 260.

2. In the same sense as B.

* II. Fig.: A channel, a passage.

"And all the conduits of my blood froze up."—Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, v. 1.

B. Engineer.: A channel, canal, or pipe, usually under ground, for the conveyance of water, electrical wires, &c.

"In channels or in condites of lead."—Palladius, ix. 34.

¶ Conduits were formerly used in London and elsewhere for the conveyance of water. There were several of them in the Metropolis. The Great Conduit in West Chesp, the first leaden cistern in the city, was commenced in 1285, and the Little Conduit in 1442. A conduit at Holborn Cross, commenced in 1498, was repaired in 1577 by Mr. Wm. Lamb, whose achievement is still commemorated in the name Lambconduit Street, given to a thoroughfare opposite to the Foundling Hospital in Guilford Street. (Haydn, &c.)

" . . . balls, dinners, gutters running with ale, and conduits spouting claret."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xl.

con-duc-t, v. t. [CONDUCT, s.; CONDUCT, v.] To conduct, to lead as in a conduit.

"This corruption, even to this day, is still conducted to his undone posterity."—Felltham: Resolves, p.

con-dup-li-cant, a. [Lat. duplicans (genit. duplicantis), pr. par. of duplico = to double.]

Bot.: Doubled up, folded together, as when the leaflets of a compound leaf are applied to the faces of each other.

con-dup-li-cate, a. [Lat. duplicatus, pa. par. of duplico = to double: con = cum = with, together, and dupico = to double; duplex = double.] [DUPLICATE.]

Bot. (of venation, aestivation, &c.): Having its sides applied parallel to each other's face. It is used specially of leaves folded from the middle, so that one half is applied by its upper surface to the other half, as in the oak, the almond-tree, or the magnolia.

con-dup-li-cate, v. t. [CONDUPLICATE, v.] To double or fold over, to duplicate. (Cockeram.)

con-dup-li-cā-ted, pa. par. or a. [CONDUPLICATE, v.]

con-dup-li-cā-tion, s. [Lat. duplicatio, from duplicatus, pa. par. of duplico.] [CONDUPLICATE, v.]

1. Gen.: The act or process of doubling or folding over; a duplicate, a doubling.

2. Bot.: A form of aestivation in which the sides of an organ are applied to each other face to face.

con-lur-ān-gō, s. [A North American Indian word.]

Phar.: The dried stems and bark of Gonolobus Condurango (q.v.). This substance has bōl, bōy; pōt, jōw; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -gion = zhūn. -tions, -sions, -cions = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl been tried as a remedy for cancer, but was found of no use. (Garrod: Materia Medica.)

cōn-dūr-rīte, s. [Named from the Condurrow mine near Helstone in Cornwall, where it is found; with suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: A variety of Domeykite. It is black and soft, soiling the fingers. Sometimes it is formed of Domeykite with arsenite of copper and sulphide of the same metal. The arsenic, in its composition causes it to give forth an alliacious odour when heated on charcoal before the blowpipe.

*con-dat, *con-date, *con-dnyte, s. [CONDUCT, CONDUIT.]

cōn-dy-lar, a. [Modelled as if from a Mod. Lat. condylaris.] Containing, or in any way pertaining to, condyles.

"The condylar portions or ex-occipitals bear the articulating condyles on their lower part, close to the margin of the foramen magnum in its anterior half."—Quain: Anat. (5th ed.), 1, 33.

¶ Among the bones of the head there are an anterior and a posterior condylar foramen.

¶ Condylar surfaces of the tibia:

¶ Anat.: Two slightly concave articular surfaces which sustain the femur.

cōn-dy-le, s. [Lat. condylus, from Gr. κόνδυλος (kondulos) = the knob formed by a bent hand; a knuckle.]

Anatomy:

1. Human: An eminence bearing a flattened articular surface.

¶ The term has been variously applied by anatomists, but the foregoing is the meaning most frequently assigned to it. (Quain.)

¶ There are condyles of the femur, of the humerus, of the lower jaw, and of the occipital bone.

2. Compar.: The corresponding parts in the lower vertebrata. It is used of the surface by which one bone articulates with another, and especially of the articulate surface or surfaces by which the skull articulates with the vertebral column. (Nicholson.)

cōn-dy-l-i-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat. condylium; Gr. κόνδυλος (kondulion), dimin. of κόνδυλος (kondulos).] [CONDYLE.]

Bot.: The autherid of a chara. (Treas. of Bot.)

cōn-dy-lōid, a. [Gr. κόνδυλος (kondulos) = . . . a knob, a knuckle, and είδος (eidōs) = form, appearance.] Having the appearance of a condyle.

cōn-dy-lō-pe, s. [See def.] The same as CONDYLOPED and CONDYLOPOD (q.v.).

cōn-dy-lō-pēd, s. [Lat. condylus and pes (genit. pedis).] The same as CONDYLOPOD (q.v.).

cōn-dy-l-ō-pōds, cōn-dy-lōp-ō-ḡa, s. pl. [Gr. κόνδυλος (kondulos) = a knob, a knuckle, and πούς (pous), genit. πόδος (podos) = a foot.] Zool.: The articulate animals with jointed legs, such as the spiders and the crabs.

cōn-dy-lūr-a, s. [Gr. κόνδυλος (kondulos) = a knob, a knuckle, and οὐρά (oura) = the tail. So named from an assemblage of small cartilaginous filaments, somewhat resembling a star in appearance, which La Faille erroneously represented as being on the tail, whereas they really are upon the nose.]

Zool.: A genus of Talpidae (Moles). The species which are called Star-noses are from North America; Condylura macroura, from the region of the Columbia river, being the best known. [Star-nosed Mole.]

cōne, s. [In Sw. kon; Wel. con; Fr. cône; Port. cone; Sp. & Ital. cono; Lat. conus; Gr. κῶνος (kōnos) = . . . a mathematical cone, . . . a pine-cone, from the Sansc. root co = to bring to a point.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 6.

2. Anything shaped more or less like a mathematical cone.

"Now had Night measur'd with her shadowy cone Half way up hill this vast sublimar vault."—Milton: P. L., iv, 776.

II. Technically:

1. Geom.: A solid figure described by the revolution of a right-angled triangle about one of the sides containing the right angle, which side remains fixed. If the fixed side be equal to the other side containing the right angle, the cone is called a right-angled cone; if it be less than the other side, an oblique-angled, and, if greater, an acute-angled cone. The axis of a cone is the fixed straight line about which the triangle revolves. The base of a cone is the circle described by that side containing the right angle which revolves. Similar cones are those which have their axes and the diameters of their bases proportionals. (Euclid.)

2. Optics: A pencil of rays of light emanating from a point and diverging as they proceed on their course.

3. Astron.: A conical-shaped shadow projected by a planet on the other side from that on which it is illuminated by the sun.

4. Geol.: A conical mound or hill produced by the showering down around the orifice of eruption of scoria, dust, and the various other materials ejected. Many hundreds of such cones may be seen in France in the ancient provinces of Auvergne, Velay, and Vivarais, arranged in chains of hills. Sometimes such a cone becomes truncated by a portion of the volcano falling in during an eruption. Papan-dayang, in Java, did so in 1772, and a volcano in Alaska in 1786. (Lyell.) There are numerous volcanic cones in America, and it is claimed that some of the largest volcanic mountains, such as Orizaba, in Mexico, have been entirely built up by the deposition of material hurled from a steadily rising crater.

5. Zoology:

(1) The English name of any shell of the large tropical molluscous genus Conus (q.v.). The name also of any animal of that genus.

(2) Pl. (cones): The English name of the Conidae, a family of Gasteropodous mollusca.

6. Bot.: A kind of anthocarpous or collective fruit, called also Strobilus, shaped somewhat like a mathematical cone, and consisting of an ament, the carpella of which are (scale-like) spread open, and bear naked seeds. Sometimes these scales are thin with little cohesion, but frequently they are woody and cohere into a single tuberculate mass. A modification of it is the Galbulus, which is globular, and has the heads of the carpella much enlarged. The fruit of the Scotch Fir (Pinus sylvestris) is a genuine cone, whilst the Juniper is a galbulus, with fleshy coherent carpella. It used to be considered as a spike in which the rachis and bracts have become partially lignified, or in which the bracts are membranous. But more recent investigations have shown that it is not a collection of flowers, but an assemblage of seeds, fruit, or pseudo-carp resulting from a single flower. The top furnishes an instance of a true strobilus or cone with membranous bracts. (Alfred W. Bennett, F.L.S., &c.)

"The cones dependent, long and smooth, growing from the top of the branch."— Evelyn.

7. Gun-making: The vent-ping which is screwed into the barrel of a fire-arm. The outer end is the nipple for receiving the percussion-cap. (Knight.)

¶ Purple Cone:

Bot.: A plant, one of the Echinaceae, order Compositae. (American.)

cone-bit, s. A boring-bit of conical form. (Knight.)

cone-compasses, s. pl. A pair of compasses with a cone or bullet on one leg, to set in a hole; bullet-compasses. (Knight.)

cone-flower, s. A plant, genus Rudbeckia, order Compositae.

cone-gear, s. A mode of transmitting motion, consisting of two cones rolling together. (Knight.)

cone-head, s.

Hortic.: The name given by gardeners to Strobilanthes, a genus of Acanthaceae.

cone-in-cone, a. Resembling a series of hollow cones, each inserted in the one next exceeding it in size. This structure is occasionally found in coal, limestone, &c., and is probably due to pressure acting on concretions in course of formation.

cone-joint, s. A joint formed by a double cone of iron inserted into the ends of the pipes to be joined, and tightened by screw-bolts. (Knight.)

cone-plate, s.

Mech.: A strong plate of cast iron fixed vertically to the bed of a lathe, with a conical hole in it, to form a support for the end of a shaft which it is required to bore. (Weale.)

cone-pulley, s.

1. An arrangement for varying the speed of the bobbin in spinning-machines, giving them a gradually decreasing velocity as the roving is wound thereon, so as to keep an equal strain on the roving. The lower pulley is driven with a uniform speed, and communicates motion to the other by a band which is slipped towards the larger end of the upper roller as the roving gradually fills the bobbin.

2. Mach.: A pulley with several faces of varying diameter, so as to obtain varying speeds of the mandrel; a speed-pulley. (Knight.)

cone-shaped, a. Shaped like a cone; conical.

cone-shell, s. The English name of Conus, the typical genus of the molluscous family Conidae (q.v.).

cone-valve, s. A hollow valve having a conical, perforated face, through which water is discharged when the valve rises, without impinging directly upon the valve-face or seat. (Knight.)

Cone-wise coupling: A mode of connecting the ends of shafting, consisting of an outer sleeve and two inner sleeves. (Knight.)

cone-wheel, s. A wheel with several applications: (1) Two frustums are in apposition, one having teeth on its face and the other a spirally arranged row of studs. The toothed wheel at its small end acts upon studs on the larger portion of the opposite wheel and conversely. The effect is to confer a regular variability of rotation to the stud-wheel from a regular rotation of the driving-frustum. (2) The frustum, being driven by the motor, communicates motion to the wheel above it. This is not intermittent or variable, but is adjustable. The nearer the upper wheel is to the base of the cone, the faster will it rotate, and conversely. (Knight.)

cōn-ēi-chy-ma, s. [Gr. κῶνος (kōnos) = a cone, and εἴχημα (eichēma) = an infusion.]

Bot.: The tissue, made up of conical cells, in the hairs of some plants.

conepate, conepati, s. [Mexican.] The name given in Mexico to the Skunk (Mephitis Americana), an animal of the Mustelidae or Weasel family.

cō-nēs-sī, s. & a. [Etym. doubtful.] The name given in Great Britain, but not by the natives of India, to the bark described below.

conessi bark, s. A kind of bark obtained from an Indian plant, Wrightia antidysenterica, of the order Apocynaceae. It is a valuable astringent and febrifuge. In Malabar it is called Palapatta. (Lindley.)

* conveth, s. [CONVETH.]

cō-nēy, cō-nŷ, s. [CONV.]

coney-fish, s. [CONV-FISH.]

† cōn-fāb, s. [A contraction of confabulation (q.v.).] Familiar talk or conversation; chat, gossip.

"He made me follow him into the library that we might continue our confab without interruption."—Mad. D'Arbly: Diary, i, 179.

* cōn-fāb, v. i. [CONFAB, s.] To chat familiarly or easily; to confabulate.

"Mr. Thrane and I were dressing, and as usual confabbing."—Mad. D'Arbly: Diary, i, 150.

* cōn-fāb-u-lar, s. [CONFABULATE.] Pertaining to or connected with confabulation.

† cōn-fāb-u-lāte, v. i. [Lat. confabulatus, pa. par. of confabulor = to talk together; con = cum = with, and fabulor = to talk; fabula = a tale, a narrative.] To talk familiarly together; to chat, to gossip, to prattle.

"I shall not ask Jean Jacques Rousseau if birds confabulate or do."

2. A number of persons, parties, or states, confederated for mutual aid and support; a league, a confederation, a coalition.

"... two rival confederacies of statesmen, a confederacy zealous for authority and antiquity, and a confederacy zealous for liberty and progress."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 1.

II. Law: A combination or conspiracy of two or more persons to carry out any illegal act.

* cón-fēd-ēr-āte, a. & s. [Lat. confederatus, pa. par. of confedere = to join or ally by treaty, from cón = cum = with, together, and federo = to make a treaty; fedus = a treaty; Fr. confédérer.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: United, joined, or associated by a league, compact, or treaty.

"... all the powers Of earth and hell confederate. . ."—Cooper: The Task, bk. v.

2. Fig.: Allied, united, in league.

"My heart is not confederate with my hand."—Shakespeare: Rich II., v. 2.

II. Hist.: Pertaining to the Confederate States or their cause.

* [Confederate States of North America:]

Hist.: The name assumed by the Southern or Slave-holding States which in 1860 and 1861 seceded from the United States of America, maintaining their separation by war, and supporting for a time with great heroism, but not with ultimate success, their attempt at separation.

From the first slavery had flourished in the Southern States of the Union, while, speaking broadly, the North had been free from the transcendent evil, and year by year contained an increasing number of abolitionists, eager for its extinction everywhere.

Up till 1860 the South had volung power sufficient to elect men of democratic or Southern views to the United States Presidential chair, but in November, 1860, a nominee of the "republican" North, Abraham Lincoln, was legally elected chief ruler.

The South feared that he would use his influence against the "domestic institution" which it cherished, and rejected all his protestations that he would strictly conform to the law.

On the 20th December South Carolina led the way in secession, followed by Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Georgia, Louisiana, Texas, part of Virginia, Arkansas, Tennessee, and North Carolina.

These took the name of the Confederate States of North America, whilst their opponents called themselves Federals.

The secessionists on February 9th, 1861, elected Jefferson Davis their President, the rest tacitly acquiescing in the decision.

On April 13th Fort Sumter, near Charleston, was taken by the South Carolinians, and a challenge thus thrown down to the North, which, being accepted, commenced a sanguinary war.

On the 21st July the first great battle, that of Bull Run, took place.

After the surrender of General Lee to General Grant, on April 9th, 1865, the Confederate cause became hopeless, and peace was soon afterwards restored.

The war has resulted in the abolition of slavery throughout the United States.

B. As substantive:

1. Gen.: One joined or associated with another for mutual aid and support in any enterprise; an ally, an associate.

(1) In a good or at least doubtful sense:

"For this cause all the confederates beyng assembled by the Lacedemonians for this matter, they were contente that the peace should be concluded."—Neot: Thucydides, fol. 131.

(2) In a bad sense: An accomplice.

"... he found some of his confederates in gaol."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

2. Spec. (pl.): The members of those states of the American Union which supported slavery.

* Crabb thus discriminates between confederate and accomplice: "Both these terms imply a partner in some proceeding, but they differ as to the nature of the proceeding: in the former case it may be lawful or unlawful; in the latter unlawful only. In this latter sense a confederate is a partner in a plot or secret association; an accomplice is a partner in some active violation of the laws. Gny Fawkes retained his resolution, till the last extremity, not to reveal the names of his confederates: it is the common refuge of all robbers and desperate characters to betray their accomplices in order to screen themselves from punishment." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cón-fēd-ēr-āte, v. i. & t. [CONFEDERATE, a.]

A. Intrans.: To join together in a league or confederation; to unite for purposes of mutual aid and support; to league.

"... the chief of the German Protestants that confederated with France. . ."—Styrrup: Memorials, Edw. VI., an. 1552.

B. Trans.: To join in a league or compact, to ally, to unite.

"With these the Pierces them confederate."—Daniel.

* cón-fēd-ēr-ā-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONFEDERATE, v.]

I. Ord. Lang.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

bēl, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -lan, tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -sious, -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

2. Hist.: Murdock's translation of the Lat. word Fœderati, applied to a sub-division of the congregations among the Manicheans and the Cathari. They were not so strictly bound down as the "Comforted" (Consolati), but promised before death to enter into the latter class. (Mosheim: Ch. Hist., ed. Murdock, cent. xii., pt. ii., ch. 5, § 6.)

1. The act of confederating; a league, compact, or alliance between several parties for purposes of mutual aid and support.

"The three princes enter into some strict league and confederation amongst themselves."—Bacon: Henry VII.

2. Those who enter into a league or confederacy; confederates.

II. Fig.: A union, or united body.

"It is not a single star, but like a constellation, and particularly as the Pleiades, where one of the seven hath almost no light or visibility, though knit in the same confederation with those which half the world do at one time see."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. iii., ch. 6.

¶ (1) Confederation of the Rhine:

Hist.: A confederacy of states in the vicinity of the Rhine, aggregated round France, the founder being Napoleon I., who constituted it on July 12, 1806. It soon afterwards consisted of France, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Saxony, and Westphalia, with various smaller states. The nominal capital was Frankfort on the Maine, though of course its policy was directed from Paris. It fell after the abdication of Napoleon in 1814. In 1815 it was succeeded by the Germanic Confederation (q.v.).

(2) Germanic Confederation:

Hist.: A confederation of the German states instituted in 1815, and continuing till the 1st of January, 1871, when it was superseded by the German Empire.

(3) Swiss Confederation:

Polit., Geog., & Hist.: A confederation of the 22 Swiss cantons. Up till 1848 Switzerland constituted a league of semi-independent states, but in the year 1848 it became a "bundesstaat," or united confederacy, and has continued to be so till the present time. The present constitution received national sanction by a vote of the people on April 19, 1874, and came into force on May 29 of the same year. It vests the supreme legislative and executive authority in a Federal Assembly consisting of two houses—a state council and a national one—the first with 44 members, the latter 135. Every citizen of the republic above twenty years old may vote, and there is a general election every three years. (Fred. Martin: Statesman's Year-Book.) * côn-féd-ér-ā-tive, a. [Eng. confederate(s); -tive.] Of the nature of or pertaining to a confederation.

côn-féised, a. [CONFUSED.] (Scotch.)

côn-fér, * côn-ferre, v. i. & t. [Lat. confero = to bring together: con = cum = with, together, and fero = to bring, to bear; Fr. conférer; Sp. conferir; Ital. conferire.]

A. Transitive:

* 1. To bring together for the purposes of comparison; to discuss, to compare, to examine.

"The captain general assembling the masters together once every week . . . to conferre all the observations, and notes of the said ships. . . ."—Hackluyt: Voyages, vol. i., p. 323.

* 2. To apply, to turn, to direct.

"Conferre all thy studie, all thy time, all thy treasure to the attaining of ye sacred and sincere knowledge of divinitie."—Ljly: Epiphany, p. 112.

3. To bestow, to grant as a permanent gift or possession.

"Then conferret the benefits, and he receives them . . ."—Arbutnot: History of John Bull.

(a) Followed by on or upon before the recipient.

"Rest to the limbs, and quiet I confer On troubled minds."—Waller.

"(b) Sometimes followed by to.

"Everything seems to have some beneficial tendency, according to which it confers somewhat to the good . . . of the principal creatures."—Barrow: Sermons, i., 2.

"(c) With two objects.

"We should confer These Trojans their due fate and death."—Chapman: Iliad, II. 907.

* 4. To contribute, to help, to conduce, to tend.

"The closeness and compactness of the parts resting together, doth much confer to the strength of the union."—Glanville.

B. Intransitive:

1. To meet together for the purpose of comparing thoughts, ideas, or plans; to discuss, to converse, to consult, to compare views. (Followed by with before the person consulted, and of before the matter considered.)

" . . . he is now ready to discuss the conditions of peace; and with that view he has conferred with his colleagues."—Times, Nov. 13, 1876.

2. To contribute, to help, to conduce.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to confer and to bestow: "Confering is an act of authority; bestowing that of charity or generosity. Princes and men in power confer; people in a private station bestow. Honours, dignities, privileges, and rank, are the things conferred; favours, kindnesses, and pecuniary relief, are the things bestowed. Merit, favour, interest, caprice, or intrigue, gives rise to confering; necessity, solicitation, and private affection, lead to bestowing. England affords more than one instance in which the highest honours of the state have been conferred on persons of distinguished merit, though not of elevated birth: it is the characteristic of Christianity, that it inspires its followers with a desire of bestowing their goods on the poor and necessitous. It is not easy to confer a favour on the unthankful: the value of a kindness is greatly enhanced by the manner in which it is bestowed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

† côn-fér-ée, s. [Eng. confer; -ee.]

1. One with whom a person confers, discusses, or consults.

2. [CONFEREE.]

côn-fér-énce, s. [Fr., from Lat. conferens, pr. par. of confero = to bring together.] [CONFER.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. The act of comparing or collating two or more things together; comparison, collation.

"The conference of these two places, containing so excellent a piece of learning as this, expressed by so worthy a wit as Tully's was, must needs bring on pleasure to him that maketh a true account of learning."—Ascham: Schoolmaster.

* 2. The act of considering; discussing or considering mentally.

"Read the place, and ye shall take both pleasure and profit in conference of it."—Ascham: Schoolmaster, bk. II.

3. The act of comparing views, ideas, or plans; discussion, consultation; interchange of views.

"Reading maketh a full man: conference a ready man."—Bacon: Essays, No. 50.

* 4. Analogy or agreement.

"John Knoo does not meet the held of my particle quare: I do mark the conference betwix the phrase of the scriptures alleged be vs health."—Reasoning, Croicraguell & J. Knox, F. 18, a. 19, b.

5. A meeting or gathering for the purpose of conferring or comparing views and ideas; or for the settlement and adjustment of differences.

II. Technically:

1. Diplomacy: A meeting of the representatives of different powers for the purpose of adjusting differences. For details see example.

"It would tend to uniformity of expression in the great debate if you would state that the business of a Conference is a Protocol,—that of a Congress, a Treaty. Many hon. members have spoken of a Conference who, I am sure, would be surprised to hear that the way of peace is by a Congress."—Times, Feb. 2, 1878.

2. Parliamentary usage: A meeting of two branches of a legislature, by their committees, to consider and adjust differences respecting bills, &c. (Webster.) If a bill is in dispute between the two Houses of the American Congress, the House which at the moment is in possession of the bill asks for the conference. The other House then fixes the time and place. If a "simple conference" fail to adjust matters, a "free conference" follows, and it is customary to ask for one if two of the ordinary kind have failed. Afterwards all, till the difficulty is removed, must be free.

3. Law: A meeting between a barrister or other advocates and a solicitor: to consult about the case of the client for whom they are acting.

4. Eccelesiology:

(1) A meeting of the ministers of any Church for the consideration and regulation of church matters.

"Soon after his return from America, he had commenced the Annual Conference of Presbytery."—Newman: Development of Christian Doctrine, ch. I., § 1.

(a) Gen.: In the foregoing sense.

(b) Spec.: An annual gathering of the ministers, now with a certain number of lay representatives of the several Wesleyan Methodist congregations, to deliberate upon the affairs of the religious denomination to which they belong. [METHODISM.]

(2) A meeting not held at stated intervals, but arranged to adjust some difference which may exist between Churches or sections of Churches.

¶ Many conferences have taken place abroad between Churches or parties in Churches. Thus there were conferences between Lutherans and Roman Catholics at Ratisbon in A.D. 1601; one in 1685 between John Claude, of the French Reformed Church, and James Bénigne Bossuet, a Roman Catholic; and one at Thorn in 1645, with the view of reconciling the Lutherans and the Reformed Churches; but the conference to which the name is most frequently applied in England was that at Hampton Court.

¶ Hampton Court Conference:

Ch. Hist.: A conference between King James I. of England, immediately after his accession to the Southern throne, and the representatives of the Anglican and the Puritan parties in the Church. In October, 1603, the king appointed the conference. Its first meeting was held at Hampton Court on the 14th of January, 1604, James on that day receiving the Anglicans. The second day, January 16th, the Puritans were admitted to make their statement and discuss it with their opponents. The third day, January 18th, the bishops and deans were called in to settle with the king what alterations should be made in the regulations of the Church. Then the Puritans were called in to have the decision intimated to them, and the conference closed.

Numerous confessions have been put forth, and among others the following:—

(1) The Confession of Augsburg: [AUGSBURG CONFESION].

(2) The Westminster Confession: A confession of faith drawn up by what was called an Assembly of Divines, but which had also some laymen among its members, sitting by authority of the Parliament between A.D. 1643 and 1647. Ninety-seven were English and nine, with two "scribes," Scotch commissioners. The place of meeting was Henry VII.'s Chapel at Westminster. The confession of faith was agreed to in 1643, and was designed to be the standard of belief for the whole kingdom, England as well as Scotland. In the former country, however, it was never cordially accepted by the nation; in the latter it was so received. It was ratified by the Scottish General Assembly on August 27, 1647, and by the Parliament of the northern kingdom on February 7, 1649, as it was once more, under William and Mary, on June 7, 1690. Its tenets were essentially those of the Reformed Churches in general. It is still the chief symbolic book of the Evangelical Presbyterian Churches in Britain and America, though explanations or qualifications of the teaching on one or two points are permitted in some of the churches.

¶ The Thirty-nine Articles are a confession of faith in all but the name. [ARTICLES.]

5. Confession of indictment:

Law: A confession by an accused person that he is guilty of the offence with which he is charged. [Blackstone.]

6. Sacramental Confession:

Theology & Church History:

(1) Def.: "The habitual and detailed confession of sins to a priest, with a view of receiving priestly absolution, and of so becoming better prepared for a faithful and true partaking of the Holy Communion, and of attaining to a higher standard of true spiritual life." [Ep. of Gloucester & Bristol, quoted in Times, Oct. 27, 1877.]

(2) Hist.: Originally notorious offenders were required to confess their sins publicly before the congregation. There existed also an ancient practice of voluntary confession in public of private offences and secret sins. In the fifth century Pope Leo the Great gave permission to confess the latter kind of sins in private to a priest appointed for the purpose. This was the origin of sacramental confession, which soon after became an institution, though confession to a priest was optional till the thirteenth century, when Innocent III., at the fourth Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215, rendered it compulsory. It has since continued to be practised in the Roman Catholic Church, and efforts have been made by the Ritualistic party to reintroduce it into the Church of England. It has no place in the standards of the English Church, and has been repudiated by the vast majority of its adherents, whether clerical or lay. Hooker thus speaks of it: "I dare boldly affirm that for many hundred years after Christ, the Fathers held no such opinion; they did not gather by our Saviour's words (John xx. 23) any such necessity of seeking the priest's absolution by secret and (as they now term it) sacramental confession. Public confession they thought necessary by way of discipline, not private confession as in the nature of a sacrament necessary." [Hooker: Eccles. Pol., vi., c. 436.]

• confession-chair, s. A confessional.

• côn-fês-sion-âire, a. [O. Fr.] A penitent; one who has made confession.

† I. Ord. Lang.: One who confesses any fault or crime.

II. Technically:

1. Ch. Hist.: The name given by the early Christians to one who manfully faced death rather than deny or conceal his Christian faith, but who had not his life actually taken away. If he were put to death he was a martyr and not a confessor. Both were exceedingly honourable titles, but the martyr was the higher of the two. (In this sense often proc. côn-fês-sôr.)

"... some confessors, who had manfully refused to save themselves from torments and death by throwing frankincense on the altar of Jupiter, ..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

2. Eccles.: A priest who officially hears confessions and prescribes penance to penitents, or grants them absolution.

¶ Confessor of the Sovereign: The title of a dignitary called also Clerk of the Closet (q. v.).

côn-fês-sôr-ship, s. [Eng. confessor; -ship.] The office or position of a confessor.

* côn-fêst, pa. par. or a. [CONFESS.]

A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adj.: Acknowledged, admitted, not concealed or disputed; open.

"since the perfidious author stands confest!"—Rose: Royal Convert.

* côn-fêst-ly, adv. [Eng. confest; -ly.] Confessedly, admittedly, avowedly, openly; with acknowledgment.

"They address to that principle which is confestly predominant in our nature."—Decay of Piety.

* côn-fi-clent (clent as çhent), a. [Lat. conficiens, pr. par. of conficio = to confound, to effect.] That which causes or effects; effective. (Bailey.)

côn-fi-dant (m.), côn-fi-dante (f.), s. [Fr. confident (m.) confidente (f.); O. Fr. confulant (m.), confidante (f.).] [CONFIDENT.] One who is entrusted with private secrets, especially one trusted in affairs of love; a bosom friend.

"Quick with the tale, and ready with the lie—The genial confidante, and general spy."—Byron: A Sketch.

côn-fide, v. i. & t. [Lat. confido: con = with, together, fully, and fid = to trust; fidus = faithful, trustworthy; Fr. confier.]

A. Intrans.: To have trust, confidence, or reliance in or upon; to rely, to trust, to believe.

"That I should fear, not sociably mild, As Raphael, that I should much confide."—Milton: Pt. L., bk. xi.

¶ With in before that in which trust or confidence is placed.

"Confiding in our warts of worth, he stands."—Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. ix., l. 55-60.

B. Trans.: To entrust or give in charge to another; to commit, to acknowledge.

"... it had been confided to two eminent men, ..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xl.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to confide and to trust: "Both these verbs express a reliance on the fidelity of another, but confide is to trust as the species to the genus; we always trust when we confide, but not vice versa. We confide to a person that which is of the greatest importance to ourselves; we trust to him whenever we rest on his word for anything. We need rely only on a person's integrity when we trust to him, but we rely also on his abilities and mental qualifications when we place confidence; it is an extraordinary trust, founded on a powerful conviction in a person's favour. Confidence frequently supposes something secret as well as personal;

trust respects only the personal interest. A king confides in his ministers and generals for the due execution of his plans, and the administration of the laws; one friend confides in another when he discloses to him all his private concerns; a merchant trusts to his clerks when he employs them in his business; individuals trust each other with portions of their property. A breach of trust evinces a want of that common principle which keeps human society together; but a breach of confidence betrays a more than ordinary share of baseness and depravity." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côn-fi-déd, pa. par. or a. [CONFIDE.]

côn-fi-dence, * côn-fi-dens, s. [Fr. confidence, confiance; Ital. confidenza, confianza; Sp. confidencia, confianza, from Lat. confidentia, from confidens, pr. par. of confido = to confide; con = cum = with, together, fully, and fid = to trust; fidus = faithful, trustworthy.]

1. The act of confiding in or placing firm trust or reliance on any person or thing; trust, belief.

"... the Cardinal Benedict, who enjoyed his full and unlimited confidence."—Milton: Hist. Latin Christianity, bk. ix., ch. vii.

¶ It is now followed by in, but formerly of was also used.

"Society is built on trust and trust upon confidence of one another's integrity."—South.

2. Firm trust or reliance on oneself or one's powers or abilities; boldness.

"His times being rather prosperous than calm, had raised his confidence by success."—Bacon: Hen. VII.

3. Excessive trust or belief in oneself, boldness, assurance, conceit.

"... their confidence, for the most part, riseth from too much credit given to their own wits, ..."—Hooker: Dedication.

4. That in which reliance or trust is placed; a ground of trust or reliance.

"What confidence is this wherein thou trustest?"—2 Kings xviii. 10.

5. A state or condition of close intimacy or trust.

"Such a citizen who lived afterwards in great confidence with Cæsar."—Middleton: Cicero, l. 244.

6. The quality of being worthy to be confided in or relied on; trustworthiness.

"He was met by ministers of confidence, commissioned to seize the offices of government."—Gibbon: Decline and Fall, iv. 134.

7. A confidential talk or conversation; a confidence.

"The next time we have confidence."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, I. 4.

8. A feeling of security or trust.

"Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God."—1 John iii. 21.

¶ For the difference between confidence and hope see HOPE.

côn-fi-dent, a. & s. [Lat. confidens, pr. par. of confido = to confide.]

A. As adjective:

1. Assured, sure, secure; having full confidence or trust.

"To build our altar, confident, and bold."—Cowper: Conversation.

(1) Followed by a clause.

"I am confident, that very much may be done towards the improvement of philosophy."—Boyle.

(2) Followed by of.

"Defying earth, and confident of heaven."—Byron: Lara, II. 8.

(8) Followed by in.

2. Self-reliant, bold, courageous.

"Achilles answered; all thou knowest, speak and be confident."—Chapman: Homer's Iliad, bk. I.

3. Over-bold or full of assurance; presumptuous, conceited.

"A wise man scarcely, but the fool rageth, and is confident."—Proverbs xii. 15.

4. Positive or dogmatic in conversation.

† 5. Trusting, without suspicion.

"Rome, be as just and gracious unto me, As I am confident and kind to thee."—Shakesp.: Tit. And., I. 1.

6. Trustworthy, confidential.

7. Giving reason or grounds for confidence.

"The cause was more confident than the event was prosperous."—Taylor.

B. As subst.: [CONFIDENT.]

"If ever it comes to this, that a man can say of his confident, he would have deceived me, he has said enough."—South.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, quite, ôur, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = é; ey = ä. qu = kw.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between confident, dogmatical, and positive: "The first two of these words denote an habitual or permanent state of mind; the latter either a partial or an habitual temper. There is much of confidence in dogmatism and positivity, but it expresses more than either. Confidence implies a general reliance on one's abilities in whatever we undertake; dogmatism implies a reliance on the truth of our opinions; positivity a reliance on the truth of our assertions. A confident man is always ready to act, as he is sure of succeeding; a dogmatical man is always ready to speak, as he is sure of being heard; a positive man is determined to maintain what he has asserted, as he is convinced that he has made no mistake. Confidence is opposed to diffidence; dogmatism to scepticism; positivity to hesitation. A confident man mostly fails for want of using the necessary means to ensure success; a dogmatical man is mostly in error, because he substitutes his own partial opinions for such as are established; a positive man is mostly deceived, because he trusts more to his own senses and memory than he ought. Self-knowledge is the most effectual cure for self-confidence; an acquaintance with men and things tends to lessen dogmatism; the experience of having been deceived one's self, and the observation that others are perpetually liable to be deceived, ought to check the folly of being positive as to any event or circumstance that is past." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōn-fīg-ū-rate, v.t. [Lat. figuratus, pa. par. of figuro: con = cum = with, together, and figuro = to form, to figure; figura = a figure.] To assume a harmonious or concordant shape; to take form or position, as the parts of a complex structure.
 "Where pyramids to pyramids relate, And the whole fabric doth configure."
Jordan: Poems (before 1650).

cōn-fīg-ū-rā-tion, s. [Fr. configuration; Lat. configuratio, from configuratus, pa. par. of configuro.]
 1. Ord. Lang.: The form, shape, or position of parts of any thing in relation to each other.
 "Chili must formerly have resembled the latter country in the configuration of its land and water."—Darwin: Yoy. round the World (ed. 1870), ch. xli, p. 258.
 2. Astrol.: The relative position of the planets; the face of the horoscope according to the relative aspects of the planets at any time.
 "The aspects, conjunctions, and configurations, of the stars . . ."—Sir T. Browne: Christiani Morals, li. 6.

configure (cōn-fīg-gēr), v.t. [Fr. configurer; Lat. configuro.] To dispose or arrange into any shape or form; to fashion, shape, or frame after a model.
 "Mother earth brought forth legs, arms, and other members of the body, scatter'd and distinct, at their full growth; which coming together, cementing, and so configuring themselves into human shape, made lusty men."—Bentley: Sermon.

configured (cōn-fīg-gērd), pa. par. or a. [CONFIGURE.]
configuring (cōn-fīg-ēr-īng), pr. par., a., & s. [CONFIGURE.]
 A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).
 C. As subst.: The act of shaping or forming after a model; configuration.

cōn-fī-nā-ble, a. [Eng. confine(e); -able.] Capable of being confined, restricted, or limited.

cōn-fī-ne or † cōn-fī-ne', s. & a. [CONFINE, v.]
 A. As substantive:
 I. Literally:
 1. A common boundary, frontier, border, or limit (generally used in the plural).
 "On the confines of the city and the Temple had been founded, in the thirteenth century, a House of Carmelite Friars, . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.
 2. A neighbour; or perhaps bordering or neighbouring territory.
 "Now, neighbour confines, purge you of your scum."
Shakesp.: 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4.
 3. A place of confinement.
 "Ham. A goodly one; in which there are many confines, wards, and dougones; Denmark being one of the worst."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, li. 2.
 II. Fig.: A boundary, limit, or extreme.
 "Rep. O, sir, you are old, Nature in you stands on the very verge Of her confine; you should be ruled, and led . . . By some discretion, that discerns your state."
Shakesp.: King Lear, li. 4.
 B. As adj.: Neighbouring, bordering upon, adjoining.
 ¶ For the difference between confines and border, see BORDER.

cōn-fī-ne', v.t. & t. [Fr. confiner = to confine, to abut or bound upon . . . to lay out bounds unto; also, to confine, to relegate (Colgrave); Fr. confin = near, neighbouring, from Lat. confinis: con = cum = with, together; finis = a boundary (Skeat).]
 A. Intransitive:
 1. To border (upon), to touch (on); to have a common boundary, frontier, or limit.

(1) With the prep. with.
 "Half lost, I seek What readiest path leads where your gloomy bounds Confine with heav'n."
Milton: P. L., li. 977.
 (2) With the prep. on.
 "Full in the midst of this created space, Betwixt heav'n, earth, and skies, there stands a place Confining on all three."
Dryden.
 * To restrict or limit oneself.
 "Children, permitted the freedom of both hands, do oft times confine unto the left, and are not without great difficulty restrain'd from it."—Browne: Falgar Errours.
 B. Transitive:
 I. Literally:
 * 1. To form a boundary or frontier to, to bound, to limit.
 2. To shut up, to restrict, to keep within bounds.
 "The third is a mixture of the two former, where the pupils are restrained, but not confined . . ."—Goldsmith: On Polite Learning, ch. xiii.
 * 3. To drive beyond the confines or borders; to banish, to expel.
 "We, by the help Of these his people, have confined him hence."
Heywood: Golden Age, 1611.

II. Figuratively:
 1. To keep within limits, to restrict, to limit.
 "If the gout tempts, I confine myself wholly to the milk diet."—Temple.
 * 2. To bring to an end, to conclude, to limit.
 3. To restrict or limit in application or reference.
 "Looking to the cases which I have collected of cross-bred animals closely resembling one parent, the resemblances seem chiefly confined to characters almost monstrous in their nature."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. viii., p. 275.

¶ To be confined:
 Medical:
 1. To be in child-bed; to bear a child.
 2. To be constipated.
 ¶ For the difference between to confine and to bound see BOUND.

cōn-fī-ned', pa. par. or a. [CONFINE, v.]
 A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.
 B. As adjective:
 I. Ordinary Language:
 1. Lit.: Shut up, restrained within limits, imprisoned.
 2. Figuratively:
 (1) Restricted, circumscribed, not extensive.
 "Considering the small size of these islands, we feel the more astonished at the extent of their aboriginal beings, and at their confined range."—Darwin: Yoyage round the World (ed. 1870), ch. xvii., p. 87.
 (2) Restricted in application or reference.

II. Medical:
 1. Brought to bed of a child.
 2. Constipated.
 ¶ For the difference between confined and contracted, see CONTRACTED.

cōn-fī-nēd-nēss, s. [Eng. confined; -ness.] The state or quality of being confined, limited, or restricted.
 "... the imperfection of his views, and the confineness of his powers."—Hoadly: Letters signed Britannicus, Let. 68.

† cōn-fī-ne'-lēs, a. [Eng. confine; -less.] Without limit or boundary; unbounded, unlimited.
 "Will seem as pure as snow; and the poor state Esteem him as a lamb, being compared With my confineless harms."
Shakesp.: Macbeth, iv. a.

cōn-fī-ne'-mēt, s. [Eng. confine; -ment.]
 A. Ordinary Language:
 I. Literally:
 * 1. The act of confining, shutting up, or restraining.
 "As to the numbers who are under restraint, people do not seem so much surprised at the confinement of some, as the liberty of others."—Addison.
 2. The state of being confined, shut up, or imprisoned.
 "The poor man, ready to faint with grief and fear, was conducted by the officers of the House to a place of confinement."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.
 ¶ Crabb thus discriminates between confinement, captivity, and imprisonment: "Confinement is the generic, the other two specific terms. Confinement and imprisonment both imply the abridgment of one's personal freedom, but the former specifies no cause which the latter does. We may be confined in a room for ill health, or confined in any place by way of punishment; but we are never imprisoned but in some specific place appointed for the confinement of offenders, and always on some supposed offence. . . . Confinement is so general a term, as to be applied to animals and even inanimate objects; imprisonment and captivity are applied in the proper sense to persons only, but they admit of a figurative application. The poor stray brutes, who are found trespassing on unlawful ground, are doomed to a wretched confinement, rendered still more hard and intolerable by the want of food: the confinement of plants within too narrow a space will stop their growth for want of air." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

II. Figuratively:

1. The act of restricting, limiting, or confining.

2. A restraint, limit, or restriction.

"The mind hates restraint, and is apt to fancy itself under confinement when the sight is pent up."—Addison.

B. Med.: Childbed, parturition, lying in.

con-fī-nēr, *cōn-fī-nēr, s. [Eg. con-fine(-) -er.]

I. Literally:

1. * One who lives upon the borders or confines of another country; a borderer.

"The senate hath stirr'd up the confiners, And gentlemen of Italy . . ." Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

2. One who or that which confines, restrains, or limits a boundary or limit.

* II. Figuratively:

1. A connecting link, a connection.

"The particles or confiners between plants and living creatures are such as have no local motion: such as oysters."—Bacon.

2. Anything closely allied; a close or near neighbour.

" . . . they are such neighbours and confiners in art. . . ."—Wotton.

3. Anything which restrains, limits, or restricts.

con-fī-nez, s. pl. [CONFINER, s.]

con-fī-nīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONFINER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of putting in confinement, restricting, or limiting.

* con-fīn-i-tý, s. [Lat. confinitas, from confinis = neighbouring, bordering.] [CONFINER, v.] The quality of being bordering or neighbouring; nearness, neighbourhood, contiguity.

con-firm, * con-ferme, * con-fermen, * con-fermi, * con-fermy, v.t. & i. [O. Fr. confermer; Fr. confermer; Sp. & Port. confirmar; Ital. confermare, from Lat. confirmo = to strengthen, to confirm: con = cum = with, together, fully, and firmo = to strengthen; firmus = strong, firm.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. To make stronger or firmer; to strengthen. " . . . confirm the feeble knees."—Isaiah xxxv. 3.

2. To ratify, to settle, to establish. "The gods old laws he confermade vaste."—Rob. of Gloucester, p. 522.

3. To render valid by a formal assent. "That treaty, so prejudicial, ought to have been ratified rather than confirmed."—Swift.

4. To render certain or beyond doubt by fresh evidence; to bear witness to. "Your eyes shall witness and confirm my tale, Our youth how dextrous, and how fleet our sail." Pope: Homer's Odyssey, bk. vii., l. 417, 418.

5. To strengthen, assure, or encourage in resolution, purpose, or opinion. "But on I must: Fate lends me; I will follow—There you read What may confirm you."—Ford: The Wench of Edmonton, l. 2.

6. To fix firmly in, to radicate.

II. Ecclesiastical:

1. To administer the rite of confirmation to. [CONFIRMATION.] "Teh sign the with signe of croys, And with the crems of heie confermt." Shoreham, p. 15.

2. (Script. Lang.): To appoint, choose out, or set apart for a special purpose or end. "For those hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel to be a people unto thee."—2 Sam. vii. 24.

* B. Intrans.: To affirm, to maintain, to declare.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to confirm and to corroborate: "The idea of strengthening is common to these terms, but under different circumstances: confirm is used generally; corroborate only in particular instances. What confirms serves to confirm the mind of others; what corroborates strengthens one's self: a testimony may be confirmed or corroborated; but the thing confirms, the person corroborates: when the truth of a person's assertions is called in question, it is fortunate for him when circumstances present themselves that confirm the truth of what he has said, or if he have respectable friends to corroborate his testimony." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

He also discriminates between to confirm and to establish: "The idea of strengthening is common to these as to the former terms, but with a different application: confirm respects the state of a person's mind, and whatever acts upon the mind; establish is employed with regard to whatever is external: a report is confirmed; a reputation is established: a person is confirmed in the persuasion or belief of any truth or circumstance; a thing is established in the public estimation. The mind seeks its own means of confirming itself; things are established either by time or authority: no person should be hasty in giving credit to reports that are not fully confirmed, nor in giving support to measures that are not established upon the surest grounds; a reciprocity of good offices serves to confirm an alliance, or a good understanding between people and nations; interest or reciprocal affection serves to establish an intercourse between individuals, which has, perhaps, been casually commenced." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

con-firm-a-ble, a. [Eg. confirm; -able.] Capable of being confirmed, made certain or assured. "It may receive a spurious limate, as is confirmed by many examples."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

* con-firm-ance, s. [Lat. confirmans, pr. par. of confirmo.] Confirmation, assurance, encouragement.

"For their confirmation, I will therefore now Slope in our black barkes." Chapman: Homer's Odyssey, bk. III.

con-fir-mā-tion, * con-fir-mā-çl-ōn, s. [Fr. confirmation; Prov. cofermatio, confirmatio; Sp. confirmacion; Port. confirmacao; Ital. confermazione; all from Lat. confirmatio (acc. confirmationem).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of confirming anything or any person. (1) Gen.: In the foregoing sense. "Their blood is shed In confirmation of the noblest claim." Cooper: The Task, bk. v.

(2) Spec.: Evidence in support of a doctrine or a statement; proof. "The arguments brought by Christ for the confirmation of his doctrine, were in themselves sufficient."—South.

2. The state of being confirmed. " . . . and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all . . ."—Phil. i. 7.

3. That which strengthens anything, as the evidence adduced in support of a doctrine or statement. "Trifles light as air Are to the jealous confirmations strong As proofs of holy writ."—Shakespeare: Othello, III. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Ecclesiast. & History:

(1) Def.: The act of confirming a child, a young person, or anyone, by the imposition of a Bishop's hands. For further details see (3).

(2) Hist.: The passages adduced in support of this rite are Heb. vi. 1, Acts viii. 14—17, xix. 5, 6, especially the first of the three. Confirmation was originally administered as the concluding part of the baptismal ceremony, whether the baptised person was an adult or an infant. Some think the practice was general by the year A.D. 190. The primitive practice in this respect still continues in the Greek Church. Christ, or sacred ointment, was used at least from the time of Tertullian, in the 2nd century. The unction was the first part of the ceremony; the second was the unction, or signing with the sign of the cross; and the third was the imposition of the bishop's hands, with the invocation of the Holy Ghost. In the Church of Rome, Confirmation is one of the seven sacraments, the formula used being, "I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and confirm thee with the Christ of salvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The opposition by the Protestants in the 16th century to the administration of Confirmation to infants made the Council of Trent postpone it to the seventh year of a child's age.

(3) Present Practice in the Church of England: The Liturgy in one place has this heading: "The Order of Confirmation, or laying on of hands upon those that are baptised, and come to years of discretion." When godfathers and godmothers present a child of tender years for baptism, the demand is made by the officiating clergyman, "Dost thou, in the name of this child, renounce the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow nor be led by them?" To this the reply is made, "I renounce them all." At the conclusion of the Baptismal Service the godfathers and godmothers are exhorted to take care that the child be brought to the bishop to be confirmed as soon as it can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, besides having been instructed in the Church Catechism. When these qualifications have been attained, and a suitable age reached, their names are sent to the bishop, who, if satisfied with them, administers to them publicly, with others, the rite of Confirmation. On their part they are held to confirm and ratify in their own persons the engagements made in their behalf, whilst yet they were infants, by their godfathers and godmothers. After questions put and answered, and prayer offered, the Bishop lays his hand on the head of each one to be confirmed, with prayer, and then with the pronouncing of a blessing. None, it is ordered, are to be admitted to the Holy Communion unless they have either been confirmed or are desirous of being so.

2. Law:

(1) Eccles. Law: The ratification by an Archbishop of the election of a Bishop by a Dean and Chapter. Originally the Archbishop had real power to decline to confirm such a case, but for about 200 years back he has had no liberty of refusing to do his part; nor have the Dean and Chapter been free to refuse to elect the individual recommended to them in the Congé d'élire (q.v.).

(2) Conveyancing: A kind of conveyance by which a voidable though not a void estate is made "unavoidable" and valid, or a particular estate increased. This can be done by the insertion of the words "ratified and confirmed," with which are generally associated, for further security's sake, the other words "given and granted."

con-firm-a-tive, a. [Fr. confirmatif; Ital. confirmativo, from Lat. confirmatus, pa. par. of confirmo.] Having the power of, or tendency to, confirm or strengthen; corroborative.

con-firm-a-tive-ly, adv. [Eg. confirmative; -ly.] In a confirming manner; so as to confirm.

* con-fir-mā-tōr, s. [Lat., from confirmo.] One who or that which confirms or attests; a confirmer. "There wants herein the definitive confirmator, and test of things uncertain, the sense of man."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

con-firm-a-tōr-ý, a. [Eg. confirmator; -ý.]

I. Confirming, containing, or adding confirmation or corroboration. "All this illustration, all this confirmatory proof, is wanting to the Roman history during the first four and a half centuries of the city."—Lewis: Crad. Bar. Roman Hist. (1855), ch. vi. § 5, vol. I, p. 227.

* 2. Relating or pertaining to the rite of confirmation. "It is not improbable, that they [the disciples] had in their eye the confirmatory usage in the synagogues. . . ."—Bishop Compton: Episcopalia, p. 85. (1686.)

¶ Conflict of laws:
Law: Variance between the laws of two countries, one that of the plaintiff, and the other that of the defendant. This occasionally arises in cases of marriage between the subjects of different rulers.

¶ Crabth thus discriminates between conflict, combat, and contest: "A conflict has more of violence in it than a combat, and a combat than a contest. A conflict and combat, in the proper sense, are always attended with a personal attack; contest consists mostly of a striving for some common object. A conflict is mostly sanguinary and desperate; it arises from the undisciplined operations of the bad passions, animosity and brutal rage; it seldom ends in anything but destruction: a combat is often a matter of art and a trial of skill; it may be obstinate and lasting, though not arising from any personal resentment, and mostly terminates with the triumph of one party and the defeat of the other: a contest is interested and personal; it may often give rise to angry and even malignant sentiments, but is not necessarily associated with any bad passion; it ends in the advancement of one to the injury of the other. . . . Violent passions have their conflicts; ordinary desires their combats; motives their contests: It is the poet's part to describe the conflicts between pride and passion, rage and despair, in the breast of the disappointed lover; reason will

"I have been to you a true and humble wit, At all times to your will conformable." Shakesp.: Hen. VIII., II. 4.

B. Geol.: A term used of strata in contact with each other, which have the planes of each parallel to those of the others. Thus the strata A, s, c, d are conformable with each other, but rest unconformably on E, v, o, n, i, j, k, &c. The conformability of strata, as a rule, indicates that the record of the leading geological changes between the deposition of the lowest and that of the highest of such conformable strata, speaking broadly, is complete; but a great lapse of time, of which no record has been preserved, at least at this spot, has taken place where unconformability occurs. The former is a book with the pages consecutive; the latter is one with a great many leaves at one place torn out. A vast lapse of time occurred between the deposition of p and d, during which the lower strata were lifted up to the high angle at which they now stand; there was a much briefer period between the deposition of p and a.

CONFORMABLE AND UNCONFORMABLE STRATA

Crabb thus discriminates between conformable, agreeable, and suitable: "The decision of a judge must be strictly conformable to the letter of the law; he is seldom at liberty to consult his views of equity; the decision of a partisan is always agreeable to the temper of his party; the style of a writer should be suitable to his subject. Conformable is most commonly employed for matters of temporary moment; agreeable and suitable are mostly said of things which are of constant value; we make things conformable by an act of discretion; they are agreeable or suitable by their own nature; a treaty of peace is made conformable to the preliminaries; a legislator must take care to frame laws agreeably to the Divine law; it is of no small importance for every man to act suitably to the character he has assumed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

con-form-a-ble-ness, s. [Eng. conformable; -ness.] The quality or state of being conformable; conformability.

con-form-a-ble, adv. [Eng. conformable(-ly).]

"In that year began the long struggle between two great parties of conformists."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xl.

2. Ch. Hist.: The name arose among the exiles who fled to Holland, Frankfurt, Geneva, and other places, in or about the year 1554, to shelter themselves from the fury of the Marian persecution. Some of these exiles conducted public worship according to the liturgy established by Edward VI., which retained various rites and ceremonies which the Geneva Church had abolished. Those who did so were called Conformists, whilst those who desired to assimilate their worship to that used under the auspices of Calvin, at Geneva, were called Nonconformists. The names, especially the latter one, are still in use. [I.] con-form-'i-tan, s. [Eng. conformit(y); -an.] A conformist.

"Protestant our Puritan, Conformitan or Non-Conformiten."—Ward: Sermons, p. 8.

con-form-'i-ty, con-form-m'y-tie, s. [Fr. conformité; Prov. conformitat; Sp. conformidad; Port. conformidade; Ital. conformità, from Mod. Lat. conformitas (genit. conformitatis), from Class. Lat. conformis.] [CONFORM, a.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The state of bearing a resemblance to any person or thing; resemblance, similitude; agreement, congruity.

"Agreement therefore, or conformity, is only to be relied upon so far as we can exclude these several suppositions."—Paley: Horæ Paulinæ, ch. 1.

"... seings they might not educe the kyng to noone conformitye or agreant, to resume his lawful wyfe, ..."—Foljau, c. 243.

It may be used—

(1) With no preposition after it.

"Created, as thou art, to nobler end, Holy and pure, conformity divine."—Milton: P. L., bk. xl.

Or (2) followed by to.

"We cannot be otherwise happy but by our conformity to God."—Tillotson.

But (3) most frequently it is followed by with.

"... he would not attempt to force either nation into conformity with the opinion of the other."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xlii.

II. Technically:

I. Ecclesiology & Church History:

(1) The act of conforming to the worship of the Established Church.

(2) The whole body of those who do so viewed as an abstract existence.

2. Law: Submission to the order of a court. [Bill of Conformity.]

"Bill of Conformity: A bill filed in Chancery by an executor or administrator, who, finding the affairs of the deceased person involved, wishes them to be wound up under the direction of that section of the High Court of Judicature. To a decision given by such an authority both he and the creditors are of course compelled to conform."

con-form-'ly, adv. [Eng. conform; -ly.] Conformably; in conformity with.

con-fort, con-fort-en, v.t. [COMFORT, v.]

"Who can conforten nowe youre hartes werre?"—Chaucer: Troilus, v. 234.

Poetaster: The Purple Island, c. 11.

"It was impossible at once to confront the might of France and to trample on the liberties of England."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. iv.

3. To set one thing face to face with another for comparison or examination; to contrast, to compare.

"When I confronted a medal with a verse, I only show you the same design executed by different hands."—Addison: On Medals.

4. To oppose one evidence to another.

"We began to lay his onkindeas unto him: he seeing himself confronted by so many, went not to denial, but to justify his cruel falsehood."—Sidney.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to confront and to face: "Witnesses are confronted; a person faces danger, or faces an enemy; when people give contrary evidence it is sometimes necessary, in extra judicial matters, to confront them, in order to arrive at the truth; the best test which a man can give of his courage, is to evince his readiness for facing his enemy whenever the occasion requires." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*cōn-frōnt-, s. [CONFRONT, v.]

1. An opposition or confronting.

"A confront no less outrageous than if they had given him battle."—Hacket: Life of Williams, II. 137.

2. Standing or placed face to face, or in direct opposition.

C. As substantive :

1. The act of placing oneself face to face with or in direct opposition to anything.

2. The act of bringing things together for comparison, examination, or contrast.

*cōn-frōnt-mēt, s. [Eng. confront; -ment.]

1. The act of bringing together or placing face to face.

2. The state of being placed face to face or in direct opposition.

Cōn-fū-cian, n. & s. [Mod. Lat. Confucius, the name given by the Jesuits to K'ung-foo-tze, the great philosopher and ethical teacher of China.] [CONFUCIANISM.]

A. As adj. : Pertaining to Confucius (see etymology).

"... to prevent the use of idolatry in the Confucian religion of China."—Prof. Legge: Religions of China (1890), p. 22.

† B. As subst. : A follower of Confucius, a Confucianist.

"... nor have the Confucians ever represented the Great First Cause under any image or personification whatever."—Penny Cyc., vii. 417.

Cōn-fū-clan-ism, s. [Eng. Confucian (q.v.), and suff. -ism.]

Ethics, Comp. Religion, Hist., &c. : The system of belief and practices taught by Confucius. The proper Chinese name of this distinguished man was K'ung-foo-tze, meaning the master K'ung. According to Mr. Legge, professor of the Chinese language and literature in Oxford University, he was born of very good family, in the year s.c. 551, in Lû, one of the Chinese feudal states, covering a considerable part of what is now the province of Shantung. He married at nineteen; became a teacher in his twenty-second year; grew distinguished about B.C. 517 (i.e., when he was thirty-four), his disciples amounting to thousands; had temporarily to leave Lû in B.C. 510, owing to civil commotion; in B.C. 500, when he was fifty-one, became chief magistrate of the town of Chung-tû, wonderfully reforming the place; was subsequently made superintendent of works, and afterwards minister of crime in the state of Lû, but had to resign these appointments through the jealousy of the neighbouring states; long wandered up and down, teaching and exerting great influence; returned to Lû, but not to his previous offices, in B.C. 483, and died in B.C. 478, aged about seventy-three. Five books are said to have been compiled by Confucius, and four by his disciples; the former are looked upon with the same veneration as the canonical Scriptures among ourselves, the latter also are sacred.

Confucius was highly distinguished as a teacher of ethics. He formulated the golden rule, which is not found in its condensed expression in the old Chinese classics. Tszung having on one occasion asked him if there was one word which would serve as a rule of conduct for all the life, he replied, "Is not reciprocity such a word? What you do not want done to yourself do not do to others." But when Láo-tze, who was his contemporary, being born in B.C. 601, enunciated the still more advanced morality of returning good for evil, Confucius, being consulted on the subject by one of his disciples, rejected it, saying, "What then will you justify for good? Recompense injury with justice, and return good for good."

Confucius attached very great importance to obedience on the part of children to their parents, and to veneration on the part of people in general to their ancestors. The extension of the same doctrine led to his regarding all society in each kingdom as a great family, in all circumstances owing passive obedience to its sovereign. This tenet of Confucius has rendered his system highly popular with the successive Emperors of China and the Chinese dignitaries generally.

By most persons Confucianism is viewed simply as a system of ethics and of politics. Prof. Legge is of opinion that it is a great error to fail in regarding it also as a religion. Confucius professed to revere the Chinese faith, and to revive or advocate it, instead of setting it aside. That ancient belief was at first monotheistic, but in process of time it had become corrupted by a subordinate worship of multitudinous spirits on the one hand and by superstitious divination on the other. Prof. Legge, therefore, regards the term Confucianism as covering first of all the ancient religion of China and then the views of the great philosopher himself in illustration or modification of its teachings, as when there are comprehended under Christianity the doctrines of the Old Testament as well as the New. He worshipped T'ien, Heaven, but Heaven used by metonymy for God. At the same time there was a more specific word for God, Ti (Lordship or Government), more fully Shang Ti (Supreme Lordship or Government), which he might have employed, but ignored. During the thousand years which preceded the twenty-third century a.c. there had been instituted a worship of God for all the people, the officiator being the king; also a worship of ancestors by all, or at least by heads of families for themselves and their households. Substitution had no place in the religious sacrifices. A part of filial piety was the worship of parents; that of forefathers generally was also enjoined, prayers being offered to the dead. Nothing is stated explicitly about the state of the departed. Future retribution is in this life. As a religion Confucianism is better adapted to the more thoughtful of the Chinese than to the common people, the latter feeling more attached to Buddhism [BOODDHISM] or Taoism [TAOISM], though combinations of the several faiths frequently occur. (Prof. Legge: Religions of China (1890), lect. I, ii., Confucianism, &c.)

Cōn-fū-cian-ist, s. [Eng. Confucian; -ist.] An adherent of Confucianism (q.v.). (Also used attributively.)

"... the Heaven of the Confucianist's worship..." —Edith, Rev., Oct., 1877.

*con-fus, a. [Fr. pa. par. of confondre.] Confused, amazed, astounded. [CONFUSE.]

* cōn-fū-tō, s. [CONFUTE, v.]

- 1. To refute, disprove, or prove to be false or erroneous. (Used of things.) "If his reasons be light, and more good may be doo'd in confuting his, than in confirming our owne . . ."—Wilson: Art of Rhetorick, p. 114. 2. To nullify, to render of none effect or futile. B. Intrins.: To refute in argument. "He could on either side dispute; Confute, change hands, and still confute." Hudibras. ¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to confute, to refute, to disprove, and to oppugn: "To confute respects what is argumentative; refute what is personal; disprove whatever is represented or related; oppugn what is held or maintained. An argument is confuted by proving its fallacy; a charge is refuted by proving one's innocence; an assertion is disproved by proving that it is false; a doctrine is oppugned by a course of reasoning. Paradoxes may be easily confuted; calumnies may be easily refuted; the marvellous and incredible stories of travellers may be easily disproved; heresies and sceptical notions ought to be oppugned." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōn-fū-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONFUTE, v.]

- A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb. B. As adjective: 1. Overcome in argument. 2. Disproved, refuted; shown to be false or erroneous.

A bow, a courtesy before taking leave, or at other times. " . . . as they came up with him, he made them a very low cōngié, and they also gave him a compliment."—Buzayon: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. I. 2. Leave, departure, farewell. "And unto her her cōngie came to take." Spenser: F. Q., IV, vi. 42. II. Arch.: A moulding in form of a quarter round, or a cavetto, which serves to separate two members from one another: such is that which joins the shaft of the column to the cincture. (Chambers.) ¶ To give any one his or her cōngie: To get rid of him or her. "But the truth was, that she was occupied with a great number of other thoughts. Should she pay off old Briggs and give her her cōngié!"—Thackeray: Vanity Fair.

cōngé d'élire, * cōngé d'eslire, s. [Fr. congé d'élire; Norm. Fr. congé d'eslire = leave to elect.]

- I. Low, Ecclesiol., &c.: Leave given by means of a writ or license to a dean and chapter to elect a bishop when the see to which they belong is vacant. The tendency in Churches has almost always been to claim the liberty to elect their pastors without interference from the civil power; that power, on the contrary, has always, when it could, desired to exercise a determining voice in such elections. During the Middle Ages a protracted struggle on the subject took place between the successive Popes on the one hand, and the civil rulers on the other for the right to nominate bishops. The contest broke out in the eleventh century. In the twelfth, the civil power being temporarily worsted in the contest, the dean and chapter, between A.D. 1125 and 1145, in most places gained the power of electing their bishop. In England the Constitutions of Clarendon in 1164 accorded them this right or privilege, bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwī; oat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, çhis; sin, a; expect, Xenophon, exist. -līg, -elian, tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -çion, -çion = zhūn. -tious, -sious, -çious = shūš. -ble, -die, &c. = bēl, dēl

"At length, after much wrangling, and amidst great confusion, a vote was taken . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. XIII.

- 4. The act of confounding, perplexing, or astonishing. 5. Perplexity, astonishment. "Confusion dwell in ev'ry face, And fear in ev'ry heart." Spectator. * 6. That which causes ruin or destruction. "Thou slye devourer and confusion of gentill women." Leg. Good Wom.; Psalms, 2. * 7. Ruin, destruction, overthrow. "As by the strength of their illusion Shall draw him on to his confusion." Shakspeare: Macbeth, III. 4. 8. Obscurity, indistinctness of style or meaning. "On the other hand, the legendary style is marked by copiousness and confusion."—Lubbock: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1855), ch. XIII, pt. 2, l. 1, vol. II, p. 369. 9. The act of mistaking or confounding one thing for another. "The confusion of two different ideas. . ."—Locke. 10. The state of being confounded with or mistaken for another thing.

II. Law:

- 1. Eng. Law: The intermixture of the goods of two or more persons so that their respective shares cannot be distinguished. 2. French Law: The extinction of a debt by the creditor becoming heir of the debtor, or the debtor heir of the creditor, or in some similar way. ¶ The year of confusion: The year 46 B.C., in which the calendar was reformed by Julius Cæsar. [CALENDAR.] " . . . it was necessary to enact that the previous year (i. e. c.) should consist of 354 days, a circumstance which obtained till the epoch of the year of confusion."—Herchel: Astronomy, 6th ed. (1858), § 918. ¶ Crabb thus discriminates between confusion and disorder: "Confusion is to disorder as the species to the genus: confusion supposes the absence of all order: disorder the derangement of order: there is always disorder in confusion, but not always confusion in disorder: a routed army, or a tumultuous mob, will be in confusion and will create confusion; a whipper or an ill-timed motion of an individual constitutes disorder in a school, or in an army that is drawn up." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cōn-fū'-give, a. [Lat. confus(us); Eng. suff. -ive.]

- Confusing, confounding; tending to or causing confusion. "The sound of dashing floods, and dashing arms, And neighing steeds, confus'dlye strike mine ear." Milton: Eccl. 4. * cōn-fū'-give-ly, adv. [Eng. confuse; -ly.]

In confusion, confusedly, wildly.

† cōn-fū-t'-a-ble, a. [Eng. confute(e); -able.]

- Possible to be confuted, disproved, or shown to be false. "At the last day, that inquisitor shall not present to God a bundle of calumnies, or confutable accusations. . ."—Bacon. * cōn-fū'-tant, cōn-fu-tant, s. [Lat. confutans, pr. par. of confuto = to confute.] One who confutes, disproves, or shows the falseness of anything. "Now that the confutant may also know as he desires, what force of teaching there is contained in laughter."—Milton: Apology for Smectym.

cōn-fū-tā-tion, s. [Lat. confutatio, from confutatus, pa. par. of confuto = to confute.]

- The act or process of confuting, disproving, or showing the falseness of anything. "Form'd for the confutation of the fool." Cooper: The Task, bk. v. * cōn-fū-tā-tive, a. [Lat. confutatus(us), pa. par. of confuto; Eng. suff. -ive.] Adapted to or having the power or quality of confuting or disproving. "Albino, in his fifth section, divides Plato's Dialogues into eias-æ. Not into two general ones of exoteric and esoteric; but into the more minute, and different, of natural, moral, dialectic, confutative, civil, explosive, obsterick, and subversive."—Warburton: P. S. to Remarks on Tillard.

* cōn-fū-tō', s. [CONFUTE, v.]

- Confutation. "False below confute."—Sir T. Browne.

cōn-fū-tō', v. l. & t. [Fr. confuter; Sp. confutar; Ital. confutare, from Lat. confuto.]

- A. Transitive: 1. To convince or overthrow in argument; to convict. (Used of persons.) " . . . to oppress the sect which they could not confute."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. VI.

bnt retained for the sovereign the liberty of confirming the election, and the right was confirmed by Magna Charta in 1215. By 25 Henry VIII., passed in A.D. 1535, when a vacancy arises in an archbishopric or in a bishopric the king sends the dean and chapter a congé d'élire, accompanied by a missive directing them whom to choose. If they delay their choice more than twelve days, or select some one else than the individual named in the missive, they become liable to a premlure.

* con-gél-a-ble, a. [CONGEALABLE.]

* con-gél-ate, a. [Lat. congelatus.] Congealed. (Hallivell.)

con-gél-a-tion, s. [Fr. congelation; Prov. congelacio; Sp. congelacion; Port. congelacão; Ital. congelazione, from Lat. congelatio (genit. congelationis).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of causing to congeal or freeze, or of rendering solid.

"The capillary tubes are obstructed either by outward compression or congealation of the fluid."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments.

2. The state of being congealed, frozen, or rendered solid.

"Many waters and springs will never freeze; and many parts in rivers and lakes, where there are mineral eruptions, will still persist without congealation."—Bronius: Vulgar Errors.

3. A congealed mass, a concretion.

II. Nat. Phil., Chem., &c.: The passage of a body from the liquid to the solid state. Two known laws regulate the phenomenon: 1st, Every body under the same pressure solidifies at a fixed temperature, which is the same as that of fusion. 2nd, From the commencement to the end of the solidification the temperature of a liquid remains constant. Some fats are exceptions to the first rule.

Many liquids, viz., alcohol, ether, &c., have not been seen solidified. Most, however, can be reduced to this state. In ordinary cases liquids becoming solid occupy less space than they did before congealation took place, but water is a notable exception. It expands about 10 per cent. at the moment of passing into ice, hence when frozen in the crevices of rocks it tends to rend them asunder. Frequently a liquid, on becoming solid, crystallises; water occasionally does so. [SNOW CRYSTALS.] (Gannet.)

* con-gél-a-tive, a. [CONGEALATIVE.]

* con-géle, v. [CONGEAL.]

con-gém-i-ná-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. congemination, from congemino = to double, to duplicate; genitus = a twin.] The act or process of doubling or duplicating.

con-gé-nér, s. [Lat. (as adj.) = of the same race, (as subst.) = a joint son-in-law.]

† 1. Ord. Lang.: A person of the same race as another, or an animal or plant akin to another.

2. Biol.: An animal or plant of the same genus as another, using the term genus in a strictly scientific sense.

"It runs (in contradistinction to hopping) but not quite so quickly as some of its congeners."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (ed. 1870), ch. iii., p. 56.

* con-gén-ér-a-çy, s. [Lat. congener; a connective; and Eng. suff. -cy.] Similarity, affinity, community of origin.

"That they are ranged neither according to the merit, nor consanguinity, of their conditions."—Moré: Exposit. Seven Cs., p. 172.

* con-gén-ér-ate, v.t. [Lat. congeneratus, pa. par. of congenero = to beget or produce at the same time.] To produce, to originate.

"That which did congenerate the colour is fitted with whiteness..."—Cudworth: Morality, bk. i., ch. iii.

con-gén-ér-ic, con-gén-ér-ic-al, a. [Lat. congener (genit. congeneris), and Eng. suff. -ic, -ical.] [CONGENEROUS, II.]

"In the Stork and congener birds."—Todd: Cyclop. Anat., l. 288.

* con-gén-ér-ous, a. [Eng. congener; -ous.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Of the same origin, kind, or nature; allied.

"In this place we should introduce the wolf, a congener animal..."—Pennant: British Zoology; The Wolf.

¶ With the prep. to.

"... congeners to this are these names of ciapapuvy, &c..."—Moré: App. to Def. of Phil. Cabbala, p. 113.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: Concurring in the same action (said of muscles).

2. Nat. Hist.: Belonging to the same or an allied genus; congeneric (q.v.).

* con-gén-ér-ous-néss, s. [Eng. congenerous; -ness.] The quality or state of being congenerous or of the same origin.

"Rational means, and persuasive arguments, whose force and strength must lie in their congenerousness and suitableness with the ancient ideas and inscriptions of truth upon our souls."—Hallivell: Metempsychosis, p. 24 (1877).

con-gé-ni-al, a. [Pref. con, and genit. (q.v.).]

1. Partaking of the same kind, nature, or origin; allied, cognate.

"Welcome kindred Glooms!

Congenital Horrors, hail!"

Thomson: The Seasons; Winter.

2. Naturally adapted or suited.

"... a clemency and moderation which were by no means congenial to his disposition."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

3. Partaking of the same natural characteristics; sympathetic.

"But, as two voices in one song embrace, Fletcher's keen tribble, and deep Beaumont's base, Two, full, congenial souls..."—Berkenhead: On the Collection of Fletcher's Works.

4. Agreeable, pleasant.

"The congenial sound of the cathedral bell hovering above them all."—Dickens: David Copperfield, p. 170.

con-gé-ni-ál-í-ty, s. [Eng. congenial; -ity.] The quality of being congenial, or partaking of the same nature or kind.

"... by the analogy, which painting holds with the sister arts, and consequently by the common congeniality, which they all bear to our nature."—Sir J. Reynolds, Dis. 15.

* con-gé-ni-ál-ize, v.t. & i. [Eng. congenial; -ize.]

A. Intrans.: To partake of the same nature or feelings; to sympathize.

B. Trans.: To make congenial.

* con-gé-ni-ál-néss, s. [Eng. congenial; -ness.] The quality or state of being congenial; congeniality.

* con-gé-ni-ous, a. [CONGENIAL.] Of the same nature or character; allied, akin, similar.

* con-gén-it, *con-gén-ite, a. [Lat. congenitus = born together, with: con = com = with, together, and genitus = born.] Born or coming into existence at the same time with something else; constate.

"Many conclusions... seem, upon this account, to be congenite with us."—Hale: Origin of Manhood.

con-gén-í-tal, a. [Lat. congenitus]; Eng. suff. -al.] Born with one; constitutional; dating from birth; natural.

"Moral change or congenital defect."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. i., ch. ii., p. 82.

con-gén-í-tal-ly, adv. [Eng. congenial; -ly.] Constitutionally; from birth.

* con-géon, s. [O. N. F. * congunn, from cambionem, accus. of Late Lat. cambio. (N.E.D.)]

1. A changeling; a half-witted person, an imbecile.

conger-eel, s. The same as CONGER (1).

* cōn-gēr (2), * cōn-grē, * cōn-gērā, s. [Of doubtful etymol. The Fr. congrès has been suggested, as has the English conger (1).] A society of booksellers.

cōn-gēr-i-ēs, s. [Lat., from con = cum = with, together, and gero = to bear, to carry.] A collection or heap of particles or bodies; a combination.

"In the earliest period at which the skeleton can be detected among the other tissues of the embryo, it is found to consist only of a congeries of cells, constituting the simplest form of cartilage."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anac., vol. 1, ch. v., p. 118.

* cōn-gēs't, s. [CONGEST, v.] A heap, an accumulation.

cōn-gēs't, v.f. [Lat. congestus, pa. par. of congero = to heap together, to collect: con = cum = with, together, and gero = to bear, to carry.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To heap together, to accumulate, to gather.

"It showed his bounty and magnificence in congregate matter for building the temple, as gold, silver, brass, &c."—Sir W. Raleigh: Maxims of State.

2. Fig.: To bring or gather together; to summarize, to combine.

II. Med.: To cause an abnormal accumulation of blood within (the capillary vessels).

cōn-gēs't-ēd, pa. par. or a. [CONGEST, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

* I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Heaped together, accumulated, piled up.

"... there stood a mound of earth congested, wall'd, and trench'd around."—Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. xx., l. 174, 175.

2. Fig.: Accumulated, combined.

"That thou art last severely must account; To what will thy congested guilt amount?"—Blackmore: Creation, bk. vii.

II. Technically:

1. Med.: A term used of the capillary vessels when they are distended with an abnormally large quantity of blood.

"If the arteries are . . . brightly injected, the part may be described simply as congested."—Quain: Med. Dict., p. 356.

2. Bot.: Crowded very closely.

* cōn-gēs't-i-ble, a. [Eng. congest; -able.] Capable of being heaped up or accumulated.

cōn-gēs't-lōn (1 as y), s. [Fr. congestion; Sp. congestion; Port. congestão, all from Lat. congestio (genit. congestionis) = a heaping up, an accumulation.] [CONGEST.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A heaping up, an accumulation or gathering together, the formation of a mass.

"So is the opinion of some divines, that, until after the flood, were no mountains, but that by congestion of sand, earth, and such stuff as we now see hills strangely fraught with, in the waters they were first cast up."—Selden: On Drayton's Polycolton, s. 9.

2. Med.: An abnormal accumulation of blood in the capillary vessels, speedily producing a disordered function of the capillaries themselves. It is of two kinds—active and passive. In the former a current of blood greater than usual is determined towards the capillaries, which, not being able to give it proper vital resistance, yield to it, and become distended and weakened by its presence. In the latter the bloodvessels themselves are in an excited state, this excitement drawing to them the blood, with which they soon become engorged. The tendency of congestion unchecked for a time is to pass into inflammation of the organs affected.

cōn-gēs't-ive, a. [Eng. congest; -ive.]

Med.: Having a tendency to, or of the nature of, congestion.

"The excessive use of which [narcotics] occasions all the symptoms of congestive apoplexy and even extravasation."—Copland: Dict. Pract. Med., & Apoplexy.

* cōn-gī-a-rī, * cōn-gī-a-riē, s. [Lat. congiarium, from congius = a measure of a gallon; Fr. congiare; Ital. congiario.]

1. A largess or present made by the Roman Emperors to the people: originally of corn or wine measured out in a congius, but later of money.

"We see on them the emperor and general officers, standing as they distributed a congiary to the soldiers or people."—Addison.

2. A coin struck in commemoration of the Roman congiaria. (Ogilvie.)

cōn-gīe, s. [CONGEE (2), s.] Indian boiled rice. (Nuttall.)

cōn-gī-ūs, s. [Lat.]

Med.: A liquid measure containing one gallon. [CONG.]

* cōn-gīāc'ī-āte, v.i. & t. [Lat. conglaciatus, pa. par. of conglacio = to freeze together: con = cum = with, together, and glacio = to freeze; glacies = ice.]

A. Intrans.: To turn to ice, to freeze, to congeal.

"No other does properly conglaciate but water . . ."—Brown: Vulgar Errors.

B. Trans.: To freeze, to convert into ice.

* cōn-gīāc'ī-ā-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. conglaciatio, from conglacio = to freeze.]

1. The act or process of turning into ice.

"... it was a subject very unfit for proper conglaciation."—Brown.

2. A frost.

"... deluges, draughts; heats; conglaciations, &c."—Bacon: On Learning, by G. Wait.

cōn-gīō-bāte, * cōn-gīō-bāte, a. [Lat. conglobatus, pa. par. of conglobo = to gather into a ball, to make round like a ball: con = cum = together, and globo = to make into a ball; globus = a ball, a globe.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Massed together, and united into a ball or sphere. (Lit. & Fig.)

"Heaven's gifts, which do like falling stars appear Scattered in ether; all, as in their sphere, Were fix'd, conglobate in his soul . . ."—Dryden: Death of Lord Hastings.

¶ In the foregoing example, it will be observed, the pronunciation is conglōbate.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. (Of a flower head): Forming a rounded ball. Example, the flowers of Echinopa.

2. Anat.: [CONGLOBATE GLANDS.]

conglobate glands, s. pl.

Anat.: A name for what are more commonly called the lymphatic glands, and by modern French writers the lymphatic ganglions.

* cōn-gīō-bāte, * cōn-gīō-bāte, v.t. & i. [CONGLOBATE, a.]

A. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To form into a solid ball or mass.

2. Fig.: To gather together, to summarize or epitomize.

"... how many particular features and discriminations will be compressed and conglobated into one gross and general idea."—Johnson: Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

B. Intrans.: To become formed into a solid ball or mass.

"This may after conglobate into the form of an egg."—Brown: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii, ch. vii.

* cōn-gīō-bā-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONGLOBATE, v.]

* cōn-gīō-bāte-līy, adv. [Eng. conglobate; -ly.] In a spherical form.

* cōn-gīō-bā-tion, s. [Lat. conglobatio, from conglobo = to form into a ball or round mass.] The act or process of forming into a round body; a round body or mass.

"In this spawn are discerned many specks, or little conglobations, which in time become black."—Brown.

* cōn-gīōb'e, v.t. & i. [Lat. conglobo: con = cum = with, together; globus = a ball, a sphere.]

A. Trans.: To form into a spherical body or mass; to gather together into a ball.

"Then founded, then conglobed Like things to like; the rest to several places Disparted."—Milton: P. L., vii. 238.

B. Intrans.: To form into a spherical body or mass; to coalesce.

"Tho' something like moisture conglobes in my eye, Let no one misdeem me disloyal."—Burns: Poetical Address to Mr. William Tytler.

* cōn-gīōb'ed, pa. par. or a. [CONGLOBE, v.]

* cōn-gīō-b'ing, pr. par. [CONGLOBE.]

* cōn-gīōb'u-lāte, v.i. [Lat. con, and globulus = a little globe, a globule.] To make into a little heap.

"Swallows certainly sleep all the winter. A number of them conglobulate together, by flying round and round, and then all in a heap throw themselves under water, and lye in the bed of a river."—Johnson: In Boswell's Life of Johnson.

¶ The statement made in the foregoing example is an exploded error: swallows migrate previous to winter, and do not hibernates under water.

cōn-gīōm'ēr-āte, o. & s. [Lat. conglomeratus, pa. par. of conglomerare = to roll together, to wind up, to conglomerate: con = together, and glomero = to form into a ball; glomus (genit. glomeris) = a ball or clue of yarn or thread.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit. (Of textile fibres, other fibres, glands, or anything similar): Collected or gathered into a ball. [CONGLOMERATE GLANDS.]

"Fluide are separated in the liver, and the other conglobate and conglomerate glands."—Cheyne: Phil. Prin.

2. Fig. (Of light): Concentrated into a focus.

"The beams of light, when they are multiplied and conglomerate, generate heat."—Bacon: Works; Nat. Hist., cent. iii, § 267.

II. Bot.: Clustered.

B. As substantive:

1. Geol.: Pebble, gravel, or any similar collection of rounded water-worn fragments of calcareous, or argillaceous cement. It is sometimes called also pudding-stone, from the similarity which it has to a pudding, formed say of raisins or other fruit imbedded in a paste. The pebbles or gravel came originally from some previously-existing rock or rocks: they may have been derived from various sources, each of course having had a history of its own before becoming fixed in the conglomerate. By reading that history the geologist is able to trace the direction of currents of water, &c., and recombine lost chapters, or parts of chapters, in the history of the earth. A conglomerate resembles a breccia, but in a breccia the imbedded fragments are angular, while in a conglomerate they are rounded. Conglomerates occur more or less in all the great formations. There is a notable one subordinate to the Old Red Sandstone, and another—the dolomitic conglomerate of Bristol—in the Lower New Red Sandstone. They exist in all parts of the world and are made up of greatly varied materials, usually of some hard rock such as quartz. Conglomerates are named according to the character of their contained pebbles, as quartz conglomerate, limestone conglomerate, granite conglomerate, &c. They are made up of various sized, round, water-worn stones, cemented together by calcareous ferruginous, or silicious substances, or by simple compression. They are evidently beach deposits, made up of compacted gravel. Most of the rivers between Toulon and Genoa, along the vale of the Maritime Alps, are now forming strata of conglomerate and sand.

¶ Dolomitic Conglomerate of Bristol: A conglomerate in which pebbles are cemented together in a red or yellow base of dolomite or magnesian limestones. It is of the Permian age. It is found near Bristol, and in other parts near the Severn. Some of the fragments of the older rocks imbedded in it being angular, there might be temptation to call it a breccia, but more being rounded conglomerate is the more appropriate name. Two amphibian genera—Thecodontosaurus and Paleosaurus—occur in the stratum.

¶ For the difference between a conglomerate and an agglomerate see AGGLOMERATE.

2. Anatomy:

Conglomerate glands: Compound glands, chiefly of the racemose class. Examples—the pancreas, the salivary, lachrymal, and mammary glands, Brunner's glands, and most of the small glands that open into the mouth, the fauces, and the windpipe. (Quain.)

cōn-gīōm'ēr-āte, v.t. [CONGLOMERATE, a.] To gather into a ball, to bring together, to collect into a heap.

"Conglomerated into solid light, And darkness, radiant to be felt . . ."—Thompson: Sicknes, bk. ii.

* cōn-gīōm'ēr-ā-tēd, pa. par. & a. [CONGLOMERATE, v.]

* cōn-gīōm'ēr-ā-t'ing, pr. par. [CONGLOMERATE.]

* cōn-gīōm'ēr-ā-tion, s. [Fr. conglomération; Port. conglomeración, both from Lat. conglomeratio = a crowding together, an assembly.]

1. The collection of material substances into a mass, heap, or ball.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, qel, chorus, ghin, bench; go, gem; thin, þis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exiat. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -þion, -þion = zhūn. -ticus, -sious -cicus = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

2. Intermixture.

"The multiplication and conglomeration of sounds doth generate rarietation of the air."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

côn-glû-tin-tin, s. [Lat. con = cum = with, glûter; gluten = gum.]

Chem.: A name given to the legumin of almonds and of lupines.

côn-glû-tin-ant, a. & s. [Fr. conglutinant, from Lat. conglutino (genit. conglutinantis), pr. par. of conglutino = to glue, to cement, to join together: con = together, and glutino = to glue; gluten and glutinum = glue.]

A. As adj.: Glueing or cementing things together.

B. As substantives:

Med. & Surg.: A medical appliance which glues the opposite sides of open wounds together, and then promotes their healing.

côn-glû-tin-ate, a. [Lat. conglutinatus, pa. par. of conglutino = to glue together.] [CONGLUTINANT.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Glued, cemented, or united together. (Lit. & fig.)

"All these together conglutinate, and effectually executed, maketh a perfect definition of justice."—Sir T. Eslet: Gov., fol. 142.

2. Bot.: Glued together, instead of being united organically.

côn-glû-tin-ate, v.t. & i. [CONGLUTINATE, a.]

A. Trans.: To glue or cement together, to cause to adhere together.

"Matholius relates that in many the bones having been united within three or four days."—Boyle: Works, vol. II, p. 185.

B. Intrans.: To coalesce, to unite together by the intervention of glue or cement.

côn-glû-tin-â-ted, pa. par. & a. [CONGLUTINATE, v.t.]

côn-glû-tin-â-tion, s. [Fr. conglutination; Sp. conglutinación; Port. conglutinação; Ital. conglutinazione, all from Lat. conglutinatio.]

1. Gen.: A glueing or cementing together.

2. Spec.: The reunion of the severed parts of a wound.

côn-glû-tin-â-tive, a. [Fr. conglutinatif (m.), conglutinative (f.).] Having the power of uniting wounds; conglutinant.

côn-glû-tin-â-tôr, s. [Eng. conglutinat(e), and suff. -or.] That which has the power of uniting broken bones, the opposite sides of wounds, &c.

"The osteocolla is recommended as a conglutinator of broken bones."—Woodward: On Fossils.

côn-glû-tin-ôis, a. [Formed as if from a Lat. conglutinosis, from conglutino.] Conglutinative, conglutinant.

côn-glû-tin-ôis-ly, adv. [Eng. conglutinously; -ly.] In a conglutinative manner, closely.

"The matter of it hangeth so conglutinously together."—Swan.

Côn-gô, s. [A West African word.]

1. A river, also called the Zaire or Moienzi Ezazdi, in the west of Africa.

2. A kingdom or district in the west of Africa, about lat. 6° s., one of four constituting the wider territory described under [3].

3. The whole of Western Africa between lat. 0° 44' a. and lat. 15° 40' s., including the kingdom or districts of Loango, Congo proper [2], Angola, and Benguela.

4. A negro from the Congo.

Congo monkey, s.

Zool.: Myetes palliatus, a black howling monkey.

Congo snake, s.

Zool.: The name given by American negroes to various species of the Amphibian genus Amphtiuma, probably from its blackish colour.

côn-gou, *côn-gô, s. [A corruption of kong-fu (Amoy dialect); Chinese kung-fu = labourer's tea, or tea on which labour has been bestowed.] A tea classed by the districts from which the several descriptions come. Ningchow, Oonfas, Oopacka, and Kientucka, are called by the London brokers "Blackish-leaf kinds." These are all grown in districts near Hankow. Kysowa, Chingwos, and Pakings are called "Reddish-leaf kinds," and are grown in districts near Foochow. A small quantity of Congou called "New make" is grown in the district of Tayahan, near Canton. The flavour of each description is distinctive, arising partly from soil and climate, and partly from mode of curing. Congou is picked as first, second, and third crop, and is prepared by slowly drying the leaf over charcoal fires, and subsequently assorting carefully, so that the leaf is nearly uniform throughout the chop. A chop (an undefined quantity ranging from 200 to 700 chests of about 100 lbs. net) is the tea of one or more gardens heaped together, and cured together, having exactly the same appearance and flavor throughout. Two-thirds of the whole import of tea into the United Kingdom consists of Congou.

*côn-graf-fet, a. [An erroneous form of O. Fr. cirograffé, pa. par. of cirograffer = to register, to engross. (N.E.D.)] Registered, engrossed. "That forehead . . . in Godes court is congrafet."—Castell of Loue, 1555.

*côn-grât-u-lâ-ble, a. [Eng. congratulate (v.); -able.] Fit or deserving to be congratulated; worthy of congratulation.

côn-grât-u-lant, a. [Lat. congratulus, pr. par. of congratulari = to congratulate (q.v.).] Congratulating, expressing joy or pleasure.

"Forth rush'd in haste the great consulting peers, Raised from their dark divan, and with like joy Congratulant approach'd him."—Milton: P. L., l. 2.

côn-grât-u-lâte, v.t. & i. [Lat. congratulus, pa. par. of congratulari, from con = cum = with, together, and gratulari = to wish joy; gratus = pleasing.]

A. Transitive:

1. To declare that we share one's joy; to sympathise with the good fortune of another; to compliment or wish joy to on any happy event; to felicitate.

" . . . shaking hands and congratulating each other in the adjoining gallery."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

¶ It is generally followed by on before the subject of congratulation.

"You congratulate me on the prosperous situation of my affairs. . . ."—Melmoth: Cicero, bk. II, lett. 2.

* 2. To welcome, to express joy or pleasure at.

"They congratulate our return, as if we had been with Phylis or Banks."—Johnson: Lett. to Mrs. Thrale, Nov. 12, 1775.

¶ Followed by to before the object congratulated.

"An ecclesiastical union within yourselves, I am rather ready to congratulate you."—Sprat: Sermon.

B. Intrans.: To express one's congratulations; to declare one's pleasure or joy.

"A stranger's purpose in these lays Is to congratulate and not to praise."—Cowper: An Epist. to an Afflicted Protestant Lady in France.

¶ 1. Followed by for before the subject of congratulation.

"The inhabitants of Burdeaus hearing of the erie's arrival, sent to him messengers in the darke night thinking and congratulating for his thither coming."—Hall: Hen. VI., an. 86.

* 2. Followed by to before the object congratulated.

2. Scottish History:

(1) The Congregation, or the Congregation of Christ, was the designation which the Scottish Reformers assumed during the reign of Queen Mary. The term is supposed to have been taken from the language of the first Scottish National Covenant, that subscribed at Edinburgh on 3rd Dec., 1557, in which the word congregation occurs eight times. (Hetherington: Hist. Ch. Scotland.)

"We will maintain thame, nurse the thame, and defend thame, the hail Congregation of Christ, and every member thairof, at our hail powers, and waiking of our lyves. Unto the quhilk body Word, and Congregation, we do joyn us; and also dole renunce and forsake the Congregation of Satan, with all the superstitious, abominations, and idolatry thairof." - Knox: Hist., p. 101.

(2) The term is sometimes used in a more restricted sense, denoting one part of the body of Protestants, as distinguished from another, according to local situation. (Jamieson.)

"At Perth the last day of Mall, the year of God 1530, the Congregation of the West Country, with the Congregation of Fife, Perth, Deacie, Angus, Mearns and Montrose being convened in the town of Perth, - as confederates - to concur and assist together, &c." - Knox: Hist., p. 188.

¶ Lords of the Congregation, & Lords of the Congregation: The noblemen and other chief subscribers to the covenant or bond described under (1).

"The said Lords of the Congregation, and all the members thairof, shall remain obedient subjects to our Sovereign Lord and Lady's authority, . . ." - Articles agreed on at Leith. Knox: Hist., p. 168. [Jamieson.]

3. Roman Catholic Church:

(1) A board of ecclesiastics meeting as commissioners at Rome, both for regulative and for administrative purposes, and generally under the presidency of a cardinal. Of such congregations there are 15 for spiritual and 6 for temporal purposes. The Pope can veto their decisions, but does not do so except for weighty reasons. The most notable is the Congregation de propagandâ fide. [PROPAGANDA.]

(2) A group of monasteries of the same order, united for some special purpose, as the Congregation of Cluny, of St. Maur, &c.

4. Universities: The Congregation of the University of Oxford is an assemblage of certain official persons and the resident Masters of Arts. Its principal business is the granting of degrees. There are similarly constituted bodies in the Universities of Cambridge and Dublin.

cōn-grē-gā-tion-əl, a. [Eng. congregation; -al.]

- 1. Gen.: Pertaining to a congregation.
2. Spec.: Pertaining to the denomination of the Congregationalists (q.v.).

¶ The word was first used by the divines of the Westminster Assembly. (Collection of Scarce Tracts, ed. by Sir W. Scott, vii. 91.)

congregational music.

Music: Music in which the people or congregation take part, as opposed to that which is sung by the trained choir alone. The plain-song of the Responses, Creeds, and of the Lord's Prayer, and the melody of psalm and hymn tunes are congregational music; but services and anthems are actually set aside for performance by the choir, acting as it were as the skilled representatives of the listening and meditating people. (Stainer & Barrett.)

¶ The Congregational Union of England and Wales:

Ecclesiol. & Ch. Hist.: A union was formed in 1831 among the Congregational Churches for mutual sympathy, counsel, and co-operation. In 1833 a declaration of faith, order, and discipline was published. By its constitution and laws, adopted in October 1871, "The Union recognizes the right of every individual Church to administer its affairs free from external control, and shall not in any case assume legislative authority, or become a court of appeal." It consists of Representative Members, Honorary Members, and Associates. It holds two meetings every year - one, called the Annual Assembly, in London, in May; and the other, called the Autumnal Assembly, in autumn, in some other city or town of England or Wales.

Cōn-grē-gā-tion-əl-ism, s. [Eng. congregational; -ism.] The tenets of the Congregationalists (q.v.). Viewing these under the two heads of doctrine and Church government, the former does not essentially differ from that of the other Protestant denominations or from that of the Evangelical party in the Church of England. It is not in doctrine but in government that their peculiarity consists. They believe that every congregation has independent powers of self-government, uncontrolled by any Bishop, or Presbytery, or other external ecclesiastical authority. They recognize a ministry, have deacons as subordinate rulers in the congregation, but allow the congregation itself to decide who are fit to join its ranks, and to act with judicial power in cases of discipline.

Cōn-grē-gā-tion-əl-ist, a. & s. [Eng. congregational; -ist.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining in any way to Congregationalism, or to the adherents of that form of Church government.

B. As substantive:

Ecclesiol. & Ch. Hist. (ph.):

(1) Def., &c.: The adherents of the form of Church government called Congregationalism or Independence, or the members of the religious denomination in which these views have been carried out. They are often termed Independents, the latter name referring to the fact that their several Churches are independent of each other, and in spiritual matters of the civil power; and the term Congregationalist makes it prominent that separate congregations have self-government to an extent which they do not possess in some other religious bodies.

(2) Ch. Hist.: Congregationalists in general believe their form of Church government to be of Divine authority, and to have been that of the Apostolic Churches. The adherents of Episcopacy and of Presbyterialism, &c., on the contrary, reject this view, and put in similar claims for their own systems.

Among the sects which from the 13th century separated from the dominant Church, some doubtless had no closer bond than that of fraternal sympathy between different congregations. To descend to more modern times, the tenets of Robert Brown [BROWNIEM] were essentially those of modern Congregationalism. He was born about the middle of the 16th century, and was a near relative of the Lord Treasurer Cecil. He was first a preacher, then a schoolmaster, and afterwards a lecturer. From about 1585 he inveighed with fiery vehemence against the corruption, and to a certain extent against the constitution, of the Established Church, his philippic being varied by thirty-two successive imprisonments, some of them in cells where he could not see his hand at noonday. Notwithstanding all efforts to intimidate him, he succeeded about 1598 in setting up a congregation in London. Those in favor of his doctrines were then estimated at 20,000 in number. After a time many of them, with Mr. Brown himself, were obliged to remove to Holland, where several Churches were set up. There they were free to act according to their convictions, but falling into divisions among themselves, they so disgusted their leader that he returned to England, conformed to the Established Church which he had so vehemently and persistently denounced, and became rector of a church in Northamptonshire; was negligent in the discharge of his duty, if not even dissolute in life, and died in 1630, in prison, where he had been confined, not for the sake of conscience, but for striking a constable.

Among the Churches in Holland one was founded at Leyden, by Jacobs and Brown, in 1616. Mr. John Robinson soon after became minister of the Church. He modified the Brownist tenets, rendering them less extreme, and is by many regarded as the real founder of Independency. In his "Apologia pro Emulibus Angliæ, qui Brownistæ vulgo appellantur," published at Leyden in 1619, the Latin word independent (= independently) occurs, which may have been the origin of the word Independents as applied to men of his faith. It did not, however, come into use till between 1640 and 1642. It occurs in the title of a work, "Apologetical Narrative of the Independents," published in 1644. In 1616 Henry Jacobs returned to England from Holland and founded a meeting-house. It was the first unequivocal Independent or Congregational church in England. In 1620 a part of Mr. Robinson's congregation at Leyden removed to Plymouth, in New England. They were followed by others of the same denomination, as well as by persecuted Puritans generally all through the 17th century. There the foundations of the Independency or Congregationalism of the New World were laid deep and broad.

In Mr. Robinson's modification of the Brownist doctrines a single ruling officer, or elder, replaced the body of elders which had been devised by Barrowe as a governing body, restoring to the congregation that control of its own affairs which Barrowe's device had partly taken away. As thus constituted the Mayflower community practically governed itself under the judicious counsel of its elder. The Salem colonists, who came over nine years later, were not Independents, but the method of church government in vogue at Plymouth seemed to them so suitable to their requirements, far removed, as they were, from their English brethren, that they adopted it, and formed themselves into an Independent Church, which they made Congregational by taking the right hand of fellowship from Governor Bradford and his fellow delegates from Plymouth. The colonists who followed quickly fell into line with their predecessors, and Congregationalism became the ruling church method in New England, though with a certain element of aristocracy which was not eliminated until after the Revolution, when the Church became purely and fully democratic in doctrine and government.

American Congregationalists to-day recognize the right, and hold it to be the duty, of believers who are so situated that they can conveniently worship and work together, to organize themselves by mutual covenant as a church. This organization becomes Congregational through its public admission to their fraternity by the neighboring Congregational churches. Each such church has a pastor and deacons as officers and a working committee, chosen by the congregation for the purpose of laying out and making efficient the work of the church. There is communion of the churches, and there may be advice and admonition, under extraordinary circumstances, and ecclesiastical councils may be held for such purposes, the welcoming of any new church or pastor to fellowship being done by the council. The council does not exist among English Congregationalists. The Congregational churches of the United States have been united, since 1871, into a National Council, which meets every third year. It is made up of delegates from the churches and communicants of the whole land. Congregationalism spread slowly in the United States, it having scarcely extended beyond the boundaries of New England by 1800, the members who moved to new localities generally becoming Presbyterians. Since the Civil War there has been a marked change in these particulars, and Congregationalism has spread with much rapidity, its churches now existing in every part of the land. It possesses a considerable number of missionary and other associations and theological seminaries, and is in a condition of encouraging growth.

* cōn-grē-gā-tion-ēr, s. [Eng. congregation; -er.] A congregationalist.

"He would neither be for the Consistorians nor Congregationalists." - Haakon: Life of Williams, ii. 197.

cōn-grē-ss, s. [Fr. congrès; Sp. congreso; Port. & Ital. congresso, all from Lat. congressus = a friendly meeting, a conference . . . a contest, a fight.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A friendly meeting for discussion, a conference.

(1) Lit.: A meeting for the settlement of affairs of a difficult or delicate character between nations. [II., 1.]

"The general found himself merely the president of a congress of petty kings." - Macaulay: Hist. Eng., xiii.

(2) Fig.: A gathering, an assemblage.

↑ 2. A shock between two or more persons or things; a fight, a contest, a combat.

"Here Pallas urge on, and Lausus there; Their congress in the field great Jove withstands, Both doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands." Dryden: Virgii; Æneid 5. 616.

"From these laws may be deduced the rules of the congresses and rebellions of two bodies." Cheyne: Philosophical Principles.

II. History, Political Geography, &c.:

1. In the same sense as I. 1 (q.v.).
2. The legislature of the United States, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives. Whilst yet the British settlers in North America were colonists only, occasions arose when it was needful for them to cooperate for the attainment of particular ends. They did so in 1745 for the capture of Cape Breton, and in 1754 for holding a conference with the Indian tribes north of New York. The War of Independence made the union of the scattered colonies closer and more permanent, and the governing body then established developed into the present Congress. The American Congress must assemble at least once a year, the day of meeting being the first Monday of December. The Senate consists of two members from each state. They are chosen by the legislature of each state for six years, one third of them elected biennially. The Vice-President is ex officio President of the Senate. The members of the House of Representatives are apportioned to the several states according to population; they are elected for two years. All money bills must originate in this House, which corresponds to the House of Commons in England.

¶ Among modern congresses may be mentioned that of Münster, A.D. 1643—1648, which put an end to the Thirty Years' war; that of Ryswick, in 1697, at which peace was signed between England, France, Holland, Germany, and Spain; that of Utrecht, in 1713, signed between the Ministers of England, France, and Spain, the Emperor Charles VI., however, holding out. Coming to more modern times, a congress of sovereigns, or their representatives, was held at Vienna to arrange about the resettlement of Europe after the great disturbance of ancient landmarks produced by the wars of the first Napoleon. A congress was held at Berlin between June 13 and July 13, 1878, the British representatives being Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury, to submit to the judgment and decision of Europe the results of the Russo-Turkish war. At this congress our country obtained the permission to hold under the Porte the island of Cyprus, to be used as a place of arms whence Turkey might be defended if war again broke out.

cōn-hý-drine, a. [Lat. con(ium); Eng. hydr(ate); and suff. -ine (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: C2H7NO. An alkaloid, which is contained in the flowers and ripe seeds of hemlock, Conium maculatum. It is obtained, along with conine and ammonia, by exhausting the flowers or the seeds with hot water, acidulated with sulphuric acid, supersaturating with hydrate of potassium, and distilling. The distillate is neutralised with sulphuric acid, and evaporated on a water-bath, then absolute alcohol is added, which precipitates ammonia sulphate. The solution is then evaporated to remove the alcohol, then supersaturated with concentrated potash, and shaken with ether. The brownish-red ethereal solution is separated and evaporated on a water-bath, heated to 100°, and distilled in a stream of hydrogen in an oil-bath. The conine is purified by neutralising with hydrochloric acid and recrystallizing from alcohol. Conhydrine remains in the retort, and on heating sublimes in the upper part and neck of the retort. It is purified by crystallization from ether. Conhydrine crystallizes in pearly iridescent laminae, which melt at 120°, and boil at 225°. By the action of phosphoric anhydride, P2O5, it is converted into conine. It is a narcotic, but less powerful than conine. Conhydrine sulphate crystallizes in flat prisms, readily soluble in water.

Geometry, Algebra, & History:

1. Geom.: That part of geometry which treats of the parabola, the ellipse, and the hyperbola, produced by sections of a right cone, made in three different ways. If a right cone be cut by a plane parallel to a plane which touches the cone along the slant side, the resultant figure will be a parabola; if the section be made through both slant sides, it will be an ellipse; and if one side be cut through by a plane which, produced backwards, cuts the other side likewise produced, the section constitutes a hyperbola. Two other geometric figures can be produced when a cone is cut by a plane. If the plane cut from the apex down vertically to the base, a triangle is produced, whilst if it do so parallel to the base a circle is the resultant; but conventionally a triangle and a circle are excluded from the list of "conic sections," the term being limited to the three figures first mentioned.

2. Alg.: Algebraically viewed, conic sections are curves of the second degree—i.e., the curves belonging to such equations between co-ordinates are of the second degree.

3. Hist. of Geom.: The Greeks studied conic sections about the time of Plato, B.C. 390. About A.C. 330 Aristæus wrote a treatise on them, and Apollonius eight books on the subject about B.C. 240. But in the hands of the Greek geometers no special interest was known to attach to conic sections. Their value was not perceived till Galileo discovered that projectiles move in parabolic curves, and Kepler that planets do so in elliptical orbits. Now conic sections are regarded as an indispensable part of the higher geometry, with continual application to natural philosophy.

côn-î-cal, a. [Eng. conic; -al.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The same as CONIC, a. (q.v.).

2. Bot.: Having the figure of a true cone, as the prickles of some roses or the root of the carrot. (Lindley.)

conical-gearing, s. An arrangement of gearing in which a pair of cogged cones transmit through interposed pinions motion of the required speed.

conical-pendulum, s.

1. A pendulum of a conical shape, suspended by a wire, and moving in a circular path in a horizontal plane. [PENDBULUM.]

2. A term sometimes applied to the rotating ball governor. (Knights.)

conical-points, s. pl.

Turnery: The cones fixed in the pillars for supporting the body to be turned; that on the right hand is called the fore centre, and that on the left the back centre. (Wcale.)

conical projection, s.

Geom.: A method of projecting a part of a sphere upon a plane. A cone is formed which touches a sphere in a small circle, and the several points of the sphere are then projected upon the cone by lines drawn through the centre. This being done, the parts adjacent to the small circle of contact will be found projected into figures very like the originals. In Flamsteed's projection the degrees of latitude are made equal, which is very nearly accurate; and the parallels of latitude are perpendicular to the vertical right line into which the middle longitude circle is thrown. The proportions in length between the meridians of longitude and the parallels of latitude are made everywhere the same as on the actual globe. This plan, slightly modified, was adopted by the French.

conical-pulley, s.

Mach.: A kind of pulley used in cotton machinery, where a gradually increasing or decreasing speed is required. [CONE-PULLEY.]

conical-valve, s. A form of valve for water and steam-engines. (Knights.)

conical-wheel, s. A wheel shaped like a frustrum of a cone, and used in many ways: as a roller for turning curves in moving heavy bodies; the cone-pulleys are forms of wheels for changing speed; used in spinning-machines and lathe-heads; the fusee is a conical-wheel with a spiral track for the chain. (Knights.)

côn-î-cal-î-tÿ, s. [Eng. conical; -ity.] Conicalness.

côn-î-cal-î-ly, adv. [Eng. conical; -ly.] In the form of a cone.

"... a watering pot, shaped conically, or like a sugar-loaf, &c."—Boyle: Spring of the Air.

côn-î-cal-nëss, s. [Eng. conical; -ness.] The quality of being conical.

cō-nî-châl-çite, s. [Ger. Konichalcit, from Gr. konía (konía) = dust . . . lime-powder, and çalkós (çalkós) = copper.]

Min.: A green, malachite-looking, brittle mineral. Hardness, 4.5; sp. gr., 4.123. It is composed of arsenic acid, 30.68; phosphoric acid, 5.81; sesquioxide of vanadium, 1.78; oxide of copper, 31.76; lime, 21.96; and water, 5.61. Found in Andalusia, in Spain. (Dana.)

côn-î-çine, s. The same as CONINE (q.v.).

† côn-î-çî-tÿ, s. [Eng. conic; -ity.] The quality of being conical; conicalness.

côn-î-cō, in compos. [Gr. κωνικός (kônikos) = cone-shaped.] Shaped to a certain extent like a cone, but presenting still greater resemblance to a figure indicated in the second word of the compound.

conico-cylindrical, a. Nearly cylindrical, but yet tapering at one end, so as to form part of a long cone.

conico-hemispherical, a. Essentially hemispherical, but with resemblances to a short cone.

Bot., &c.: Awl-shaped, but to a certain extent resembling a cone.

† côn-î-cō-vâte, a. [Eng. conio, and ovate.]

Nat. Science, &c.: Ovate—i.e., egg-shaped—but to a certain extent resembling a short cone.

côn-î-ços, s. [CONIC.] The department of mathematics called conic sections, or the curves described under it. [CONIC SECTIONS.]

cō-nî-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. conus; and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zool.: Cones, a family of gasteropodous mollusca, order Siphonostomata. The shell is inversely conical, with a long and narrow aperture; the outer lip notched at or near the suture; and operculum minute. The animal has an oblong truncated foot, with a pore in the middle; the tentacles far apart, eyes on the tentacles, the gills two, long lingual teeth in pairs. They are very predatory, and bite when touched. Genera—Conus, Pleurrotoma, and Cithara.

2. Palæont.: The Conide commence in the Cretaceous rocks, are numerous in the Tertiary, and reach their maximum in the present seas.

cō-nî-d-î-ô-phôre, s. [Mod. Lat. conidia;

Gr. φῆρα (phêra) = to bear.]

Bot.: One of the branches in fungi which bear conidia.

cō-nî-d-î-ûm (pl. cō-nî-d-î-a), s. [Mod. Lat. dimin. of conus = a little cone.]

Botany:

1. Sing. (Conidium): The gonidium of a lichen, one of the green spherical cells in the thallus of a lichen constituting the distinctive mark between that order of plants and Fungi.

2. Pl. (Conidia): Certain small reproductive cells on the spawn, mycelium, and other parts of certain fungi occurring in addition to their ordinary fructification.

cō-nî-fër, s. [Lat. conus = a cone, and fero = to bear.]

Botany:

1. Sing.: A tree or shrub of the order Conifera (q.v.).

2. Pl. (Conifers): The English name given by Lindley to his order Pinaceæ, generally called Conifera (q.v.).

cō-nî-fër-æ, s. pl. [CONIFER.]

1. Bot.: An order of plants, one of those recognised in 1751, in the infancy of botany, by Linnaeus. Jussieu in 1789 adopted the name. Lindley altered it to Pinaceæ, but retained the term Conifera as its English equivalent. Formerly he called them Conaceæ. They belong to the class or sub-class of Gymnosperms. They are fine trees or shrubs abounding in resin. Leaves linear, acerose, or lanceolate, entire at the margin, often fasciated. Inflorescence amictaceous, each floret with one stamen or a few united; ovary spread open: it arises from the axil of a membranous bract; ovules naked in pairs or several inverted. Fruit, a cone [CONE]; embryo with two or many cotyledons. Lindley divides it into two suborders, (1) Abietæ, with the ovules inverted and the pollen oval, curved; and (2) Cypressæ, with the ovules erect and the pollen spheroidal. Sometimes the Taxinæ (Yew) figure as a third, but Lindley makes them a distinct order, and calls them Taxaceæ (Taxada). Nearly 200 species are known.

They are most useful to man, supplying timber, with oil, resin, and turpentine. They are diffused over the world. Their appropriate habitat is in temperate climates; when in the tropics it is generally high on the mountainsides.

2. Palæont.: The wood of the Conifera may be distinguished from those of ordinary dicotyledons by the absence of proper ducts in the woody layers, and by the presence of large areolar discs on the walls of the wood cells. The wood of the Yew (Taxus baccata), and the Douglas Fir (Abies Douglasii), are exceptions to this rule. On the other hand, the Winteræ, which are not coniferous, but belong to the Magnoliads, have similar circular disks. When by the chemistry of nature wood is silicified, these areolar discs are at least as visible under the microscope as in recent Conifera wood; and when they occur in fossil stems, or fragments of stems, these are presumably the remains of Conifera. The ducts and glands also aid in distinguishing genera. When in double rows they are placed side by side in the European pines and firs, but are arranged alternately in the Araucaria. The Conifera commence at least as early as the Devonian. They are well represented in the Carboniferous rocks, being associated there with the higher Acrota. They flourish through the Secondary period, and on to present times. The Carboniferous Conifera may have been taxoid (Yew-like), though the genus Pinites also occurs. The species in the Secondary rocks were more akin to the Araucaria of our gardens than to ordinary pines.

cō-nî-f-ër-in, s. [Eng., &c., conifer; -in.]

Chem.: A glucoside occurring in the cambium of coniferous woods (Abies excelsa, Pinus Strobus, Larix europæa, &c.). It forms needle-shaped crystals, C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>22</sub>O<sub>5</sub>·2H<sub>2</sub>O, which effloresce in dry air, give off water at 100°, and melt at 185°: soluble in hot water, and slightly soluble in alcohol. With strong sulphuric acid coniferin gives a violet colour, turning red; on diluting the sulphuric acid solution a blue resin is deposited. Coniferin boiled with dilute acid is converted into a resin and glucose.

cō-nî-f-ër-öl, s. [Eng., &c., conifer;

Lat. oleum.]

Chem.: Coniferyl alcohol, C<sub>10</sub>H<sub>12</sub>O<sub>3</sub>, or

C<sub>6</sub>H<sub>5</sub> { OCH<sub>3</sub>
OH } A substance isomeric with C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>4</sub>·OH.

ethyl vanillin, is formed along with glucose by the action of emulsion and water on coniferin. Coniferol forms white prismatic crystals, melting at 74°, soluble in ether, and forming a red solution with sulphuric acid. If dissolved by alkalis and reprecipitated by acids, it is thrown down as an amorphous white powder, which turns brown. Crystallised coniferol exposed to the air smells like vanilla; by oxidation and agitation with ether it yields vanillin.

cō-nî-f-ër-öüs, a. [Lat. & Eng. conifer, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Cone-bearing. Used specially of trees and shrubs belonging to the order Conifera, though what are technically "cones" are not confined to this order; and the berries of some genera, Junipers for instance, formed internally on the model of a cone, look to the uninstructed quite different.

"Coniferous wood exhibits a peculiar structure which cannot be mistaken, and which is formed in no other set of plants."—Carruthers: Gymnospermaceous Fruits, from Sec. Rocks of Britain.

"Have we nowther conig ne cat, that thal ne ætlin."—Minot, p. 87.

cō-nî-îne, s. [CONINE.]

cō-nî-m-æ, s. [The native name.] A resin used for making pastilles. Also called Incense Resin, or Gum Hyawa; it is obtained from the Incense-tree, Iceta heptaphylla. It contains an essential oil and a resin.

cō-nî-m-ène, s. [Mod. Lat. conim(a), and suff. -ene.]

Chem.: C<sub>5</sub>H<sub>8</sub>. The essential oil, obtained by distilling incense resin with a large quantity of water. By fractional distillation, and purification with metallic iodine, an oil was obtained which boiled at 264°. Coniome is a colourless mobile liquid, nearly insoluble in water, mixing with alcohol, ether, and benzene; it has a pleasant aromatic odour, and burns with a smoky flame.

cō-nī-ne, s. [Lat. conium = hemlock, and Eng. suff. -ine (Chem.).]

1. Chem.: C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>15</sub>N. Also called Coniine, Cicuta, Conia. An alkaloid contained along with Conhydrine (q.v.) in hemlock, Conium maculatum. Coniine is a limpid, oily liquid, boiling at about 168°. It has a penetrating, repulsive suffocating odour, something like that of mice, and is a violent poison. It is slightly soluble in water, giving an alkaline reaction; it is very soluble in alcohol and ether. It is inflammable, burning with a bright smoky flame; on exposure to the air it turns brown, and finally into a resinous mass. Oxidised with chromic acid, it yields normal butyric acid; treated with excess of acid, coniine is decomposed into a resin and a salt of ammonia. Coniine forms a crystalline mass of needles when acted on by bromine vapour. Coniine is a secondary monamine, NH(C<sub>8</sub>H<sub>14</sub>). Nitrous anhydride passed into pure Coniine, and water then added, yields azotic hydride. Hydrochloric acid gas colours dry coniine red and then blue, but if moist forms crystals. A modification of coniine has been prepared synthetically; by heating butyric aldehyde with alcoholic ammonia, and distilling the dihydroaldine C<sub>8</sub>H<sub>17</sub>NO which is formed, a volatile oil is obtained which has the odour and physiological properties of coniine. It differs in giving a greenish-blue colour with hydrochloric acid; it precipitates silver oxide more slowly, and has no action on polarised light.

2. Pharm.: The action of coniine is to paralyse the voluntary muscles and to act on terminations of the motor nerves, producing paralysis of the respiratory muscles and death by asphyxia. The leaves of Conium maculatum are used to prepare extract of Hemlock (Extractum Conii), which is used to form pills, and as an inhalation. Preparations of Conium are used to allay muscular spasm in chorea, &c., also to alleviate cancer; the inhalation to relieve cough in bronchitis, pertussis, and phthisis.

Bot.: An order of Fungi, consisting of genera in which the spores predominate over the receptacle. It contains numerous species which infest living plants. It is divided into six sub-orders—(1) Sphaeromei, (2) Melanconie, (3) Phragmotrichacei, (4) Torulacei, (5) Pucciniae, (6) Ceomacei.

cōn-ī-ō-mŷ-çē-toŷs, a. [Mod. Lat. coniomycet(es); Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Pertaining to, or having the characteristics of, the Coniomycetes (q.v.).

cōn-ī-ōp-tēr-is, s. [Gr. kōnis (konis) = dust, and πτερίς (ptēris) = a fern.]

Palaeont.: A fossil fern, Coniopteris murragana, is from the great Oolite.

cōn-ī-ō-spēr-moŷs, a. [Gr. kōnis (konis) = dust, σπέρμα (spērma) = seed, and Eng. suff. -ous.] Having dust-like spores.

cōn-ī-ō-thā-lām-ō-sē, s. pl. [Gr. kōnis (konis) = dust, and θάλαμος (thalamos) = an inner room . . . a bedroom.]

Bot.: A tribe of Lichena. They have the shields open, the nucleus breaking up into naked spores.

cōn-ī-ō-thē-çae, s. pl. [Gr. kōnis (konis) = dust, and Lat. theca, pl. of theca = that in which anything is enclosed, an envelope.]

Bot.: Anther-cells.

"Thou gabhest, conion."—Arthur & Merlin, 1, 671.

†cō-nī-rōs-tēr, s. [CONIROSTRES.]

Ornith.: A member of the suborder or tribe CONIROSTRES (q.v.).

cō-nī-rōs-tral, a. [Lat. conus, and rostrum; and Eng. suff. -al.] [CONIROSTRES.] Having a conical beak or conical beaks; pertaining to the CONIROSTRES (q.v.).

cō-nī-rōs-trēs, cō-nī-rōs-traē, s. pl. [Lat. conus = a cone, and rostrum = the beak or bill of a bird.]

Ornith.: A suborder, tribe, or division of Insectores (Perchers). They have a conical beak or bill, short and very thick at the base; in some whole, in others it is longer and thinner. The tip is generally entire, or if there is a notch it is small. This adapts the bird for feeding on grain, though some of them also eat insects. Cuvier says that in proportion to the thickness of their bill is the exclusiveness with which they feed upon seeds. There are eight families: (1) Buceridae (Hornbills), (2) Musophagidae (Plantain-eaters), (3) Opisthocomidae (Hoatzina), (4) Coliidae (Coles), (5) Corvidae (Crows), (6) Paradiseidae (Birds of Paradise), (7) Sturnidae (Starlings), and (8) Fringillidae (Finches). By another classification it includes (1) Bucerotidae (Hornbills), (2) Sturnidae (Starlings), (3) Corvidae (Crows), (4) Loxiidae (Crowsbills), and (5) Fringillidae (Finches and Laraks).

Min.: A variety of Dolomite, Dolomitic magnesite. It is of a flesh-red colour. Compos.: Carbonate of lime, 27.53—28; carbonate of magnesia, 67.4—67.97; carbonate of iron, 3.5—5.05. It is found in Iceland.

cō-nī-ūm, s. [Latinized from Gr. κωνιον (kōnion) = (1) "hemlock," the cicuta (q.v.), (2) hemlock-jule. (Theophrastus, Liddell & Scott.) This again is from kōnos (kōnos) = a cone . . . a top, which the giddiness of one poisoned by it suggests. (Hooker & Arnott.)]

1. Bot.: A genus of Umbelliferous plants, family Snyrmidae. The fruit, which is broadly ovate, has five prominent waved or crenate ribs, without vitæ; the calyx teeth are obsolete, the petals obovate; the general involuce of few leaves, the partial one with three, all on one side. Conium maculatum is the Common Hemlock, the term maculatum referring to the spots or purple blotches on the stem. There is a fusiform biennial root. The leaves are tripinnate, the leaflets pinnatifid, with acute and often cten segments. When bruised, the leaves smell very unpleasantly. The flowers are greenish-white. They appear in June and July. The plant is two to four, five, or more feet high. It is common in waste places, by roadsides, and under walls in Britain. It occurs also in Eastern Asia. It is a good anodyne and a valuable medicine in scirrhus, acrofolous tumours, dropsy, and epilepsy. Taken in undue quantities it produces giddiness, dimness of sight, nausea, and paralysis of the limbs. It is not, however, nearly so poisonous as the Water Hemlock, Cicuta virosa. It seems to have been the Cicuta and not the Conium which was used to poison Socrates. [HEMLOCK.] Still the conium is highly dangerous. The extract which renders it so is called CONIA (q.v.).

2. Pharmacy:

(1) Conii Folia: Hemlock leaves, the fresh leaves and young branches of Spotted Hemlock, Conium maculatum; also the leaves, separated from the branches and carefully dried, gathered from wild British plants when the fruit begins to form. The leaf rubbed with a solution of potash gives out strongly the odour of conia. Preparations: Calaspasma Conii, Extractum Conii, Succus Conii.
(2) Conii Fructus: The dried ripe fruit of Conium maculatum. Preparation: Tinctura Conii.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between conjecture, supposition, and surmise: "All these terms convey an idea of something in the mind independent of the reality; but conjecture is founded less on rational inference than supposition; and surmise less than either: any circumstance, however trivial, may give rise to a conjecture; some reasons are requisite to produce a supposition; a particular state of feeling or train of thinking may of itself create a surmise. . . . We may with propriety say that a conjecture is idle; a supposition false; a surmise fanciful." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōn-jū-gā'-tōs, s. pl. [Fem. plural of conjugatus.] [CONJUGATE.]

Bot.: In some classifications a tribe of Algae containing those in which reproduction takes place by conjugation. [CONJUGATION II., 1.] The Zygnemææ, the Mesocarpææ, the Desmidiææ, &c., belong to this division. They are allied to the Convolvaceæ.

cōn-jū-gāte, v. t. [CONJUGATE, a.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: To join together, to unite closely, to connect in marriage.

"... power and occasion to conjugate at pleasure the Norman and the Saxon houses."—Sir H. Wotton: Kings of England.

2. Gram.: To inflect or decline verbs through their various voices, moods, tenses, numbers, and persons.

cōn-jū-gāte, a. & s. [Lat. conjugatus, pa. par. of conjugo = to join together: con = together, and jungo = to bind to lathes or rails; jugum = a yoke.]

A. As adjective:

1. Geom. & Optics: So related as to be interchangeable. [CONJUGATE AXES, MIRRORS, POINTS, LINES, &c.]

2. Bot.: Paired. Used spec. of the petiole of a pinnate leaf when it bears one pair of leaflets.

B. As substantive:

1. Logic: A term applied to a word having the same derivation as another, and therefore generally resembling it in meaning.

2. Chem.: A conjugate compound.

¶ (1) Conjugate axes:

Geom.: Two axes so related as to be interchangeable in position.

(2) Conjugate compounds:

Chem.: [CONJUGATED.]

(3) Conjugate mirrors:

Optics: Mirrors, the relative positions of which might be interchanged without altering the result.

¶ The experiment of the conjugate mirrors: Pictet and Saussure placed two such mirrors about four or five yards apart with their axes coinciding. In the focus of one they placed a wire basket, containing a red-hot ball, while in the focus of the other was a piece of gun-cotton or phosphorus. The effect was to ignite the inflammable body; whereas if placed above or below the focus it did not take fire. This demonstrated the existence of foci in connexion with mirrors, whilst exhibiting also the laws of reflection. (Ganoz.)

(4) Conjugate points, lines, &c.:

Geom.: Two points, lines, &c., are said to be conjugate when their relative positions might be interchanged without any alteration in the language used in describing that property or those properties of theirs to which reference is being made. To this a writer in the Penny Cyclopaedia points out that there is an apparent exception—viz., the conjugate point of a curve, by which is meant a single point lying by itself, the co-ordinates of which satisfy the equations of the curve without its actually being on the continuous branch of that curve. To abolish this anomaly of language he proposes to call the latter case the conjunct instead of the conjugate point of a curve, or to term it an evanescent oval.

cōn-jū-gā-tēd, pa. par. & a. [CONJUGATE.]

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, cōll, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, thīs; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -īng. -cian, tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn; -tious, sious, -cious = shūs. die, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

* conjugated compounds, s. pl.

Chem.: Also called copulated compounds. A term introduced in 1839, by the French chemists Laurent and Gerhardt, to designate "all such compounds as are formed by the direct union of two bodies, with elimination of water, and are capable of reproducing the original bodies by again taking up the elements of water." The term is now out of use.

cōn-jū-gā-tīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONJUGATE, v.] A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive: Gram.: The act of inflecting a verb; conjugation.

conjugating cells, s. pl.

Bot.: Two cells in some Nocroria; one at the top of each of two club-shaped bodies, as pressed to one another by their ends, and containing protoplasm. The conjugating cell at the end of each becomes separated from the rest, after which the partition-wall between them disappears, and they unite into a reproductive cell called the zygospore. (Thomé.)

cōn-jū-gā-tion, s. [Lat. conjugatio = a joining together, from conjugatus, pa. par. of conjugo = to join together: con = cum = with, together; jugum = a yoke; jungo = to join.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act or process of uniting or joining things together.

"The general and indefinite contemplations and notions of the elements, and their conjugations, are to be set aside, . . ."—Bacon.

2. A combination, a mixture.

" . . . various mixtures and conjugations of atoms . . ."—Bentley: Sermons.

3. A union or assemblage.

"The supper of the Lord is the most sacred, mysterious, and useful conjugation of secret and holy things and duties."—Jeremy Taylor.

4. A union or joining together in matrimony.

"Attested, glad, his approbation Of an immediate conjugation." Cowper: Pairing-time Anticipated.

5. A pair, a couple.

" . . . the sixth conjugation or pair of nerves."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

II. Technically:

1. Grammar:

(1) The inflection of a verb.

"Have those who have writ so much about declensions and conjugations, about concord and syntaxes, lost their labour, and been learned to no purpose?"—Locke.

(2) The act of conjugating or inflecting a verb.

(3) A number or class of verbs conjugated alike.

¶ There are in English two conjugations, an old or strong one, and a new or weak one, according to the method of forming the past tense. In the former it is expressed by vowel-change only, as shake, shook; in the latter by the addition to the verbal root of the syllable d or its euphonic substitute t, as love, loved. Weak verbs sometimes have a change of vowel, as buy, bought, teach, taught, though they generally form the past tense and past participle by the addition of -ed, or (when the infinitive ends in e) -(e)d.

2. Biol. & Phys.: A process occurring among some of the lower plants and animals, in which the substance of two distinct organisms comes into contact, and becomes fused into a single mass or "zygote." Always in plants, and sometimes in animals, it is connected with reproduction. Among the former it has been met with in the following algal groups: Zygomaceae, Desmidiaceae, Distomaceae, and Palmellaceae; and among the Fungi, in genera which contain some of the plants giving rise to mildew. In the animal kingdom conjugation is produced by the more or less complete fusion of two, three, four, or more individuals. Example: Podophyra pyrum, an infusorian. The process is called also zygosis (q.v.). (Griffith & Henfrey.)

"In the simplest cellular plants, in which every cell appears to possess the same endowment, so that there is no kind of specialisation of function, the generative act consists in the conjugation of two of the ordinary cells, between which no difference can be traced."—Dr. Carpenter: Prin. Human Phys., p. 955.

cōn-jū-gā-tion-al, a. [Eng. conjugation; -al.] Pertaining to a conjugation.

" . . . this conjugational characteristic does not appear in the verbal noun."—Beames: Comp. Gram. Aryan Lang. of India, vol. I. (1872), ch. iv., p. 282.

conjugato-palmate, a.

Bot. (Of a leaf): Having two divisions, each of them palmate.

conjugato-pinnate, a.

Bot. (Of a leaf): Having two divisions, each of them pinnate.

* cōn-jū-gī-al, a. [Lat. conjugialis, from conjugium = a union, a marriage.] Conjugial.

"Conjugial for conjugal, though allowed by a few Latin examples is a pedantry on Swedenborg's part."—Kingdoy: Lett. & Mem., II. 285.

* cōn-jūct, * cōn-jūct, a. & s. [Lat. conjunctus, pa. par. of conjungo = to join together.] [CONJOINT.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Conjoint; joined or connected closely together; in union.

"It pleas'd the king his master to strike at me; When he, conjunct, and flitting his displeasure, Tript me behind."—Shakep.: King Lear, II. 2.

2. Joint, associate.

" . . . conjunct pleopodiatary with himself, . . ."—Burnet: Own Time, an. 1709.

II. Music:

1. Noting one of the Greek systems of music.

2. Conjoint motion, a succession of sounds proceeding by single degrees. (Stainer & Barrett.)

B. As subst.: A conjunction, an association, a combination.

conjunct-fee, s.

Scots Law: A right of property granted in common to husband and wife.

"That the said schireff—charge theme to find the said schireff—under the pain of wanting of the profit of all six ward lands, conjunctive or dividant."—Acts Ja. V., 1586 (ed. 1814), p. 244.

cōn-jūnc-tion, * con-junc-ti-on, * con-jun-cti-on, s. [Fr. conjonction; Part. conjunctio; Ital. conjunzione; Prov. & Ital. conjunctio, from Lat. conjunctus.] [CONJUNCT.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The act of conjoining together, the state of being conjoined; union, association, league; that which conjoins.

"We will unite the white rose and the red: Smile heaven upon this fair conjunction."—That long bath from 'd upon their unity!"—Shakep.: Richard III., v. 4.

II. Technically:

1. Astron. (Of three heavenly bodies): The state of being in apparent union with each other. One distinction is between equatorial and ecliptic conjunction. Two heavenly bodies are said to be in equatorial conjunction, or, more briefly, in conjunction with respect to a third, when they have the same right ascension measured on the equator of the third. Similarly, they are in ecliptic conjunction with respect to it when they have the same longitude measured on the ecliptic of the third. Both conjunctions take place during the eclipse of the sun, though at different moments, unless the eclipse be exactly central. Another division is into a superior and an inferior conjunction. In the case of one of the inferior planets (Mercury and Venus) its conjunctions with the sun are the points of nearest approach to it, the inferior conjunction occurring when the planet passes between the earth and the sun, and the former when it does so behind the great luminary. The conjunction of a superior planet occurs when it is in the same line as the earth, on the same side of the sun. Planets may also have conjunctions with each other. As Professor Airy points out, the periodic times of Jupiter and Saturn being to each other in the proportion of 2 to 5, and their axes being moreover different, conjunctions between them will successively take place at different parts of their orbits. For about 450 years one planet makes the other move more quickly than its normal rate, and then for 450 more slowly than it, things reverting to what they were at the beginning after 900 years. The extreme perturbation will be 1° behind at one time, and 1° before at another, that is, 2° in all. Apparent conjunction supposes the spectator on the surface of the earth, true conjunction imagines him to be looking from its centre.

" . . . the duration of the month, as marked by the revolution of the moon round the earth, and its return to conjunction with the sun, . . ."—Lewis: Astron. of the Ancients (ed. 1823), ch. 1, § 5, p. 22.

2. Gram.: A part of speech joining together sentences, parts of sentences, and single words; as, "Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion" (Ps. cxiv. 2); "The sea saw it, and fled" (ver. 3); "Still waters, but deep." The conjunction does not, like the preposition, alter the case of the noun or pronoun following it; as, He and I. There are two classes of conjunctions, coordinating and subordinating conjunctions, the former joining coordinate clauses and the latter uniting subordinating or dependent clauses to the principal clause of a sentence. (Bain: Higher Eng. Gram.)

cōn-jūnc-tion-al, a. [Eng. conjunction; -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a conjunction.

cōn-jūnc-tion-al-ly, adv. [Eng. conjunctio-nal; -ly.] In manner of a conjunction, as a conjunction.

cōn-jūnc-ti-va, s. [From Lat. conjunctivus = connecting, conjunctive.]

Anat.: A mucous membrane lining the inner surface of the eyelids, and constituting a pellicle covering on the surface of the eyeball. The former is called the palpebral, and the latter the ocular part. In the ocular part a sclerotic and a corneal portion may be distinguished. The conjunctiva is called also the conjunctival membrane. (Quain.)

cōn-jūnc-ti-va-l, a. [Lat. conjunctiv(us); suff. -alis.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: Conjunctive, joining, connecting.

2. Anat.: Pertaining to the conjunctiva.

conjunctival membrane, s.

Anat.: The same as CONJUNCTIVA (q.v.).

cōn-jūnc-tive, a. [Fr. conjunctif; Sp. conjuntivo; Port. conjunctivo, conjuntivo, all from Lat. conjunctivus = connecting, conjunctive.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: Closely united, connected, not apart.

"She's so conjunctive to my life and soul, That, as the star moves out hot in his sphere, I could not but by her."—Shakep.: Hamlet, IV. 7.

2. Gram.: Connecting together as a conjunction.

"Though all conjunctions conjoin sentences, yet, with respect to the sense, some are conjunctive, and some disjunctive."—Zorvis: Hermes, II. 2.

¶ Conjunctive mood:

Gram.: The mood following a conjunction. It is sometimes called the subjunctive mood, but the latter term is more strictly applied only when the verb is in a subordinate sentence.

* cōn-jūnc-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. conjunctive; -ly.]

1. In conjunction; together.

2. Inclusively.

* cōn-jūnc-tive-ness, s. [Eng. conjunctive; -ness.] The quality of being conjunctive or uniting together.

cōn-jūnc-ti-ly, adv. [Eng. conjunct; -ly.] In conjunction or union; conjointly, together, not apart.

¶ Conjunctly and severally:

Scots Law: A phrase used when two or more persons are bound to the performance of any obligation jointly and severally, so that each is responsible for the full performance.

cōn-jūnc-ture, s. [Fr. conjuncture, from Lat. conjunctura = a joining, from conjunctus, pa. par. of conjungo.]

* I. Literally:

1. The act of joining or uniting together.

2. A mode of union or connexion.

"He is quick to perceive the motions of articulation, and conjunctures of letters in words."—Holder: Elements of Speech.

3. A union by marriage.

4. A meeting.

"Send us in good time a joyful conjuncture."—Howell: Letters, p. 81.

II. Figuratively:

1. A combination.

"I never met with a more unhappy conjuncture of affairs than in the business of that earl."—King Charles.

2. A combination of circumstances; a critical moment.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hère, camēl, hēr, thère; pine, pīt, eire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre. wōlf wōrk. whō. sōn: mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; try, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

"A conjuncture singularly auspicious. . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. II.

* 3. A correspondence, agreement, or consistency.

"I was willing to grant to presbytery what with reason it can pretend to, is a conjuncture with episcopacy."—King Charles.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between conjuncture and crisis: "Both these terms are employed to express a period of time marked by the state of affairs. A conjuncture is a joining or combination of corresponding circumstances tending towards the same end; a crisis is the high-wrought state of any affair which immediately precedes a change: a conjuncture may be favourable, a crisis storming. An able statesman seizes the conjuncture which promises to suit his purpose, for the introduction of a favourite measure: the abilities, firmness, and perseverance of Alfred the Great, at one important crisis of his reign, saved England from destruction." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cōn-jū-rā-tion, * con-jur-a-ci-oun, s. [Fr. & Sp. conjuration; Port. conjuração; Ital. congiurazione, from Lat. conjuratio, from conjuro = to swear together, to conspire: con = cum = with, together, and juro = to swear.]

I. Ordinary Language:

† 1. A conspiracy, a plot.

"Consentings of a conjuratione maket agens hym."—Chaucer: Boethius, p. 18.

2. The act of conjuring or invoking supernatural aid; the use of magic arts; incantation.

" . . . what drugs, what charms, What conjuration and what mighty magic, I won his daughter."—Shakespeare: Othello, I, 2.

3. A magic spell or form of words; a charm. " . . . the belief that the demon by which he was possessed, could retain his hold before a form of conjuration."—Strauss: Life of Jesus (1st ed., 1846), vol. II, § 92, p. 252.

4. A solemn adjuration or appeal.

"Mock not my senseless conjuration, lords: This earth shall have a feeling and these stones."—Shakespeare: Richard III., III, 2.

¶ With upon before the person or thing invoked or appealed to.

"If ever . . . the prophet Jeremy . . . did so earnestly ask God this question, with a conjuration upon his justice, saying, Lord, thou art just when I argue with thee. . . ."—Montague: Devout Exercises, Treat. 16.

II. Law: Blackstone makes witchcraft, conjuration, enchantment, and sorcery synonymous terms. See the ¶ for the distinction drawn between them by Cowell.

* cōn-jūr-a-tōr, s. [Lat., from conjuro.] A conspirator.

"Both these Williams before rehearsed were rather taken of suspicion and lewelly, because they were sere of blood to the conjurators, then for any proved offence or crime."—Grafton: Hen. VII., an. 29.

cōn-jū-rē, cōn-jū-rē, v.t. & i. [Fr. conjurer; Sp. conjurar; Ital. congiurare, from Lat. conjuro = to swear together, to conspire: con = cum = with, together, and juro = to swear; jus (genit. juris) = law, right.]

A. With the accent on the last syllable:

I. Transitive:

1. To plot, to plan, to conspire.

côn-nâte, a. [Lat. connatus = born at the same time, connate, innate, from con = together, and natus = born.]

† I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Born with another, born at the same birth. (Johnson.)

2. Fig.: Of the same origin with.

"Many, who deny all connate notions in the speculative intellect, do yet admit them in this."—South.

II. Botany:

1. (Of leaves): Having the bases of two opposite leaves united together.

1. Connate leaf. 2. Perfoliate Honeysuckle.

¶ Connate is not the same as perfoliate, the latter term implying that the stem runs through the base of a single leaf, the lobes of which unite around it.

2. (Of botanical structures in general): Having parts originally distinct now united together.

† connate-perfoliate, † connate perfoliate, a. A term sometimes used when two opposite leaves grow together at the base; but connate is enough to designate this peculiarity.

"[Conocarpus Caprifolium . . . leaves deciduous, glabrous, obtuse, upper ones connate perfoliate, . . .]"—Hooker & Arnott: British Flora, 7th ed. (1855), p. 194.

*côn-nâ'-tion, s. [Lat. connatio, from con = cum = with, together, and natus = born.] The state of being united or connected by birth; natural connection.

côn-nâ'-tive, a. & s. [Pref. con, and native (q.v.).]

A. As adjective:

"Connative pietate." Vicard's Virgil, 1632. (Halliwell: Contrib. to Lexicog.)

B. As subst.: A fellow-countryman.

"Sith their connative 'tis consensual." Elyester: Tobacco Sattered, 40.

*côn-nât'-u-ral, a. & s. [Pref. con, and natural (q.v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Naturally united; connected or united by birth; unborn.

"More than heretic I this to be, nor yet Hero sense of our consensual wish, nor yet Deserve the least return of human thanks." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.

2. Partaking of the same nature.

"But is there yet no other way, besides These painful passages, how we may come To death, and mix with our consensual dust?" Milton: P. L., xl. 637.

3. Born in the same place; connected. (See example under CONNATE, B.)

B. As subst.: That which is naturally connected or of the same nature.

" . . . the earth, which is the region and country of his consensualia."—Bacon: On Learning, by G. Wats, bk. vii. ch. 1.

*côn-nât'-u-ral'-i-ty, s. [Pref. con, and naturality (q.v.).] The state or quality of partaking of the same nature; natural connection or alliance.

"There is a consensualty and congruity between that knowledge and those habits, and that future estate of the soul."—Hale.

*côn-nât'-u-ral-ize, v.t. [Pref. con, and naturalize (q.v.).] To make of, or bring to the same nature or character; to adapt or accommodate.

" . . . you should consensualize your midnight revels to your temper."—Scott: Christ. Life, l. 4.

*côn-nât'-u-ral-ized, pa. par. or a. [CON-NATURALIZE.]

*côn-nât'-u-ral-iz-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CON-NATURALIZE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or process of making of the same nature or character.

*côn-nât'-u-ral-ly, adv. [Eng. consensually, -ly.] In a manner according to nature; naturally; by the act of nature.

"Some common notions seem consensually engraven in the soul, . . ."—Hale.

*côn-nât'-u-ral-ness, s. [Eng. consensual, -ness.] The state of being consensual or of the same nature or character; consensualty.

"Each is the consensualness of our corruptions, except we looked for an account hereafter."—Pearson: On the Creed.

† côn-nâ'-tûre, s. [Pref. con, and nature (q.v.).] Consensualty; natural union, connection, or similarity.

"Connature was defined as Likeness in kind between either two changes in consciousness, or two states of consciousness."—Herbert Spencer: Elements of Psychology, § 64.

*conne, v. [CON, CAN, v.]

côn-nect', v.t. & i. [Lat. connecto = to fasten or tie together; con = cum = with, together, and necto = to bind, to tie.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To join, link, or fasten together; to unite.

"The corpuscles that constitute the quicksilver will be so connected to one another, . . ."—Boyle.

II. Figuratively:

1. To unite or link together by some bond, relation, or association.

"The natural order of the connecting ideas must direct the syllogisms . . ."—Locke.

2. To form into or join in a series; to link together.

3. To associate with anything as a cause or result.

"That there may have been some historical ground, resting on a faithful official tradition, for connecting the name of Servius with an arrangement of the census is possible; . . ."—Lewis: Crad. Early Roman Hist. (1858), ch. xii. § 26, vol. 1, p. 501.

4. To join or unite by marriage (generally used in the pa. par.)

B. Reflex.: To join or associate oneself with another, or in any business.

C. Intrans.: To unite, join with, or cohere; to have a close relation or association with.

côn-nêc'-têd, pa. par. or a. [CONNECT.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

I. Lit.: United, linked, or fastened together.

"Onward methinks, and diligently slow, The firm connected bulwark seems to grow." Goldsmith: The Traveller.

II. Figuratively:

1. Joined or united by some bond or association.

2. United or linked together in a series; consistent, coherent.

3. United by marriage.

4. Concerned or interested in.

"I call him ours; for, be assured, I cannot separate myself from any thing with which you are connected."—Methook: Cicero, bk. xii. lett. 11.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between connected and related: "Connection marks affinity in an indefinite manner; relation in a specific manner. A connection may be either close or remote: a relation direct or indirect. What is connected has some common principle on which it depends; what is related has some likeness with the object to which it is related, it is a part of some whole." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) côn-nêc'-têd-ly, adv. [Eng. connected; -ly.] In a connected manner; by connection; conditionally.

côn-nêc'-têd-ness, s. [Eng. connected; -ness.] The quality of being connected or following in due order.

côn-nêc'-ting, pr. par., a., & s. [CONNECT, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (In senses corresponding to those of the verb.)

B. As adj.: Serving to connect or link two things together.

" . . . we have no right to expect . . . to discover directly connecting links between them, . . ."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. xiv. pp. 462-3.

C. As substantive: The act or process of uniting or linking two things together; connection.

connecting-link, s. A link which has a movable action by which it may be made an intermediate connection between two links of a broken chain. (Knights.)

connecting rod, s.

Machinery:

2. The coupling-rod which connects driving-wheels on the same side of a locomotive.

3. The rod connecting the cross-head of a beam-engine with that end of the working beam which plays over the cylinder. (Knights.)

côn-nêc'-tion, côn-nêx'-ion (necion or nexion as nêx-shûn), s. [Fr. connexion; Ital. connessione, from Lat. connexio = a joining together, from connexus, pa. par. of connexo = to join or link together.] [CONNECT.]

1. The act of uniting, joining, or linking together.

"So much good method and connection may Improve the common and the plainest things." Rowson: Connexions; Art of Poetry.

2. That which unites, joins, or links two things together; a bond, a union.

3. The state or condition of being connected or united; kinship, association, alliance.

"My heart, which by a secret harmony Still moves with thine, join'd in connection sweet." Milton: P. L., x.

4. A relationship, as the connection of cause and effect.

5. One who is brought into a state of relationship by marriage.

6. Sexual intercourse.

7. Character, surroundings; all matters connected with any person.

" . . . whose names, faces, connections, and characters were perfectly known to him . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

8. An intimacy, a friendship, an association.

"There form connexions, but acquire no friend." Comper: Treat., bk. II.

9. A party or number of persons of the same views or principles.

"He had long been at the head of a strong parliamentary connection."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

¶ In this connection: In connection with this subject. (American.) (Webster.)

¶ For the difference between connection and intercourse, see INTERCOURSE.

cōn-nēct-ī-val, a. [Eng. connective(-); -al.] Bot.: Of or pertaining to the connective.

cōn-nēc-tīve, a. & s. [Eng. connect, and suff. -ive; Fr. connectif (m.), connectif (f.).] A. As adj.: Having or involving a connection with; connective.

"There are times when prepositions totally lose their connective nature, being converted into adverbs. . . ."
—Harris: Hermes, II, 2.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: Any thing producing or characterized by connection.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: The part or body intervening between the two lobes of an anther, and holding them together. It is analogous to the midrib of a leaf. It is usually continuous with the filament, and terminates exactly at the apex of the anther; but in some plants, like the Composite, it is articulated with its apex; in others it is lengthened far beyond it in a crest, horn, or cup-shaped body; and yet in others it falls so far short as to make the anther look bifid.

† 2. Gram.: Any part of speech connecting words or sentences. The preposition and the conjunction fall under the definition.

"Connectives, according as they connect either sentences or words, are called by the different names of conjunctions or prepositions."
—Harris: Hermes, II, 2.

connective tissue, s.

1. Anat.: A substance consisting of two kinds of fibres, more or less amorphous matter, and peculiar corpuscles. By means of its fibres it connects different parts of the body together, besides covering, investing, and supporting different organs. The corpuscles seem designed to aid in the nutrition and repair of tissues. It is divided into the areolar, the fibrous, and the elastic tissues (q. v.). (Quain.)

2. Chem.: A substance chemically allied to cartilage, which occurs as areolar connective tissue, and as compact forming the basis of tendons, ligaments, &c. Boiled with water it yields a solution of gelatine. In concentrated acetic acid it swells up and becomes transparent, but does not dissolve till water is added and heat applied. By dilute acetic acid it is rendered transparent, and thus the other structures are rendered more visible.

* cōn-nēc-tīve-lī, adv. [Eng. connective(-); -ly.] By connection; in conjunction or union; conjointly; connectedly.

cōn-nēc-tōr, s. [Lat.]

1. Nat. Phil.: A flexible tube used for connecting or joining together the ends of glass tubes in pneumatic experiments.

2. Elect.: A name for a device for holding two parts of a conductor, as the two wires for instance, in intimate contact. It is generally called a binding-screw or a clamp.

3. Rail. Eng.: A car-coupling.

cōn-nēl-līte, s. [Named after Mr. Connel, who analysed it in 1847.]

Min.: A translucent mineral, with acicular or hexagonal prismatic crystals. Its lustre is vitreous, its colour fine blue. It is considered to be a compound of an sulphate and a chloride of copper. (Dana.)

cōn-nē-mōn, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The fruit of Cucumis Conomon, cultivated everywhere in Japan. (Treas. of Bot.) * con-ner, v. t. [O. Fr. conroyer = to curry.] To curry, to dress.

"They work the leather before it is well connored, in great hinder and skait of the Kinges Hege."
—Chamerdon Air, c. 22.

† con-ner, s. [Eng. con; -er.] One who cons or studies at anything.

* cōn-nēx', v. l. [Lat. connexus, pa. par. of connecto.] [CONNECT.] To connect or link together, to join.

"Those birds who are taught some words or sentences, cannot connex their words or sentences in coherence. . . ."
—Bale: Origin of Manhood.

* cōn-nēx, a. & s. [Lat. connexus, pa. par. of connecto.]

A. As adj.: Connected, joined, linked.

"For as it is an aphorism most true, so is it also very closely connex with piety and religion. . . ."
—More: Philosophick Cabbala, App. a. 5.

B. As subst.: A connection, an associate, a confederate.

". . . all their incidentals circumstances, dependents and connexes, that touch hym and hys persone."
—Hall: Ben, II, an. 4.

* cōn-nēx'ed, a. [Eng. connex; -ed.] Connected, coherent, consistent.

* cōn-nēx'-īng, * cōn-nēx'-yng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONNECT.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of connecting or linking together; connection.

". . . the connexing & loynyng the one to the other. . . ."
—Hall: Ben, I, an. 2.

cōn-nēx-ion (nexion as nēk-shūn), s. [CONNECTION.]

* cōn-nēx'-īve, a. [Eng. connex; -ive.] Having the power or quality of connecting; conjunctive.

* cōn-nēc-tā-tion, s. [Lat. con=cum=with, together, and nēcto = to wink.] The act of winking, a wink.

C. As subst.: The act of directing the helmsman in steering a vessel.

conning tower, s.

Navy: A heavily-armed compartment in the military mast or elsewhere on a battleship or cruiser, from which the commanding officer makes observation through peep holes.

cōn-niv'-ance, s. [Eng. connive(-); -ance.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: The act of winking; a wink.

2. Fig.: Voluntary or intentional neglect or omission to see any fault; passive co-operation, especially in a crime.

II. Law: Consent, express or tacit, on the part of a husband in the adultery of a wife, or of a wife in that of her husband. When this is proved, the person thus conniving is not entitled to obtain the dissolution of the marriage.

cōn-nīve', v. l. & t. [Fr. conniver = to wink at, to tolerate, from Lat. connivo = (1) to wink, (2) to connive.]

A. Intransitive:

* I. Lit.: To wink.

"This artist is to teach them how to nod judiciously, to connive with either eye."
—Spectator.

II. Figuratively:

1. Voluntarily to omit or neglect to see or prevent any wrong or fault; tacit approval or consent.

". . . the one connives, and the other connives."
—Decay of Piety.

(1) Followed by at.

"To connive at some scandalous pecuniary transactions which took place between his master and the Court of Versailles."
—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

(2) Followed by on.

"Pray you connive on my weak tenderness."
—Massinger: The Picture, III, 2.

* 2. To tamper, to meddle, to interfere (Followed by with).

"Nor were they ever intended to be connived with in the least syllable."

cōn-nī-vent, a. [Lat. connivens, pr. par. of connivo.]

* I. Ord. Lang.: Conniving, overlooking; voluntarily or designedly inattentive.

"His [God's] legal justices cannot be so feble and so variable, sometimes like a devouring fire, and by and by connivent in the embers. . . ."
—Milton: Doctrine, II, of Divorce, bk. II, ch. IV.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Converging; having a gradually inward inclination; having the points turned in, so arched as to meet above. Many petals are connivent.

2. Anat.: Applied to the folds of the lining membrane of canals, which serve to retard, without obstructing, the passage of the contents of such canals.

cōn-nī'-vēr, s. [Eng. connive(-); -er.] One who connives or winks at anything.

". . . consenter; conneder; connivers; connecaler; not hinderer; each of these will be found guilty before God's tribunal."
—Junius: Inv. Stigm. (1839), p. 235.

cōn-nī'-vīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONNIVE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of overlooking or winking at any fault or crime; connivance.

* cōn-nīx'-ā-tion, s. [Lat. con = cum = with, together; nix = snow.] A swallowing up in or covering with snow.

cōn-nō-tā-tion, * cōn-nō-tā-ti-on, s. [Lat. con = together, and notatio = a marking, a noting, from noto = to note, to mark.] The act of noting one thing together with something else; implication of something besides itself.

cōn-nō-tā-tīve, a. [Eng. connotate(-); -ive.] Logic (Of terms): Denoting a subject and implying an attribute. (John S. Mill.)

cōn-nōtē, v. l. & t. [Lat. con = together, and noto = to watch, to distinguish by means of a mark.]

cō-nō-çēph-ā-lit-i-dæ, * cō-nō-çē-phāl-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. conoccephalites, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ida.]

Zool.: A family of Trilobites. The glabella is narrow in front, the tail moderately developed, the thoracic rings fewer than in the Paradoxidae, to which they are closely akin.

cō-nō-dōnts, s. pl. [Gr. κωνός (kōnos) = a cone, and ὀδούς (odous), genit. ὀδόντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Palæont.: Certain minute bodies which, broadly speaking, seem like conical teeth, but vary much in form. They were first discovered by Pander in the Silurian and Devonian rocks of Russia. They have since been found in the Silurian, Devonian, and Carboniferous rocks of Britain and of North America, if not even as high as the Upper Trias. Pander, and more recently Prof. Newberry, consider them the teeth of fishes, the latter gentleman believing them to have belonged to cyclostomatous fishes like our modern lampreys and hag-fishes. Prof. Owen considered them akin to the spines, booklets, or denticles of naked molluscs and annelids, and other views have been expressed. (Nicholson.)

cō-nō-hōr-i-a, s. [Gr. κωνός (kōnos) = a cone, and ὄρος (oros) = boundary, limit.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Violaceæ. The leaves of Conohoria Loboloba are used in Brazil for spinach. When boiled it is mucilaginous.

Cō-nōn-ites, s. pl. [Named after Conon, Bishop of Tarsus in the sixth century.]

Ch. Hist.: A sect of Tritheists founded by the Conon mentioned in the etymology. The Tritheists were divided into Philoponites and Cononites, who differed in some matters regarding the resurrection of the body, the Cononites maintaining that the matter only, and not the form of the body, was corruptible, and to be reconstituted, while the Philoponites thought both would be so. [PHILOPONITES.] (Mosheim: Ch. Hist., cent. vi., pt. ii., ch. v., § 10.)

cō-nōp-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. κωνοψ (kōnops) = a gnat or mosquito, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Diptera with a distinct proboscis, the last joints of the antennæ forming a short style; the wings perfect, with the cubital vein simple, the halteres uncovered. Type, Conops (q.v.).

cō-nōps, s. [Gr. κωνοψ (kōnops) = a gnat or mosquito. This is not the modern genus Conops.]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Conopidæ (q.v.). They have oblong, prominent eyes, a long, stiff proboscis, geniculate at the base, and arched above, the abdomen rather long and arched. The species frequent flowers, the larvae being parasitic on the humble-bee. The species are found in England, the European continent, Australia, &c.

cō-nō-spēr-mī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. conospermium, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Proteaceæ, sub-order Nacamentaceæ.

cō-nō-spēr-mūm, s. [Gr. κωνός (kōnos) = a cone, and σπέρμα (sperma) = seed.]

Bot.: A genus of proteaceous plants, the typical one of the tribe Conospermidæ, with a four-cleft calyx, four stamens, a filiform style, and a free, oblique stigma. The fruit is a nut with a single silky seed. About forty species are known, nearly all from the temperate parts of Australia.

cō-nō-sty-lē-sa, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. conostyles (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -ecæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Hamodoraceæ, having a long, woolly perianth.

cō-nō-sty-līs, s. [Gr. κωνός (kōnos) = a cone, and στυλος (stulos) = a pillar, a style.]

Bot.: A genus of Hamodoraceæ, the typical one of the tribe Conostyleæ (q.v.). They are from Australia.

cōn-ōv-ul-ūs, s. [Mod. Lat., formed from Lat. ovus = a cone, and Mod. Lat. Ovulum, dimin. of Lat. ovum = an egg.]

Zool.: A genus of molluscs, family Auriculidae. The shell is obtusely cone-shaped, smooth, with a short flat-whorled spire, a long narrow aperture, the lip denticulated within. They exist in salt marshes on the sea-shore. Some are British. There are fossil species also in the Eocene. (S. P. Woodward.)

* cōn-quacē, * cōn-quēsē, s. [CONQUACÆ, v.]

1. Conquest.

"Fra tyme that he had semlyt his barnage,

A. Transitive:

1. To win or gain by conquest; to obtain possession of or authority over by superior strength.

"He conquered all the reyne of Femynye."
Chaucer: C. T., 365.

* 2. To acquire or gain in any way, to win, to earn.

"Every gode cristene man . . . beholden peynen him with all his strengthe for to conquere oare righte heritage."—Maunderville, p. 2

3. To take possession of or gain by art or otherwise.

"By degrees the virtues and charms of Mary conquered the first place in her husband's affection."—Maunderville: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

4. To vanquish, to overcome by superior might.

"Thi conquered Greats Alexander the Medis & begane y<sup>e</sup> third monarchie. . ."—Joye: Exposition of Daniel, Argument.

5. To subdue, to overcome, to surmount.

Who conquer'd nature, should preside o'er wit." Pope: Ess. on Criticism, 652.

* 6. To succeed in anything, to manage, to attain to.

"If thou with quaintise conquers hit, I quote the thy mede." E. Eng. Allit. Poems; Cleanesse, 1, 523.

"Loose naketh pees and euer shall: And who that fighteth most withall, Shall least conquer of his empire." Gower: Con. A., bk. III.

B. Intransitive:

1. To be victorious, to overcome, to gain the victory.

"Each o'er its rival's ground extending, Alternata conquering, shifting, blending." Scott: Marmion, v. 5.

* 2. To attain, to succeed.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to conquer, to vanquish, to subdue, to overcome, and to surmount: "Persons or things are conquered or subdued; persons only are vanquished. An enemy or a country is conquered; a foe is vanquished; people are subdued. . . . one may be vanquished in a single battle; one is subdued only by the most violent and persevering measures. William the First conquered England by vanquishing his rival Harold; after which he completely subdued the English. Vanquish is used only in the proper sense; conquer and subdue are likewise employed figuratively, in which sense they are analogous to overcome and surmount. That is conquered and subdued which is in the mind; that is overcome and surmounted which is either internal or external. We conquer and overcome what makes no great resistance; we subdue and surmount what is violent and strong in its opposition; dislikes, attachments, and feelings in general, either for or against, are conquered; unruly and tumultuous passions are to be subdued; a man conquers himself; he subdues his spirit." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

† cōn-quer-a-ble (quer as kēr), a. [Eng. conquer; -able.] Able or liable to be conquered, overcome, or subdued.

* cōn-quer-lesse (quer as kēr), a. [Eng. conquer; -less.] Not capable of being conquered; invincible.

"Which seeming conquerlesse did conquests leud." G. Markham: Str. R. Grinville, 61. (Davies.)

* cōn-quer-mēt (quer as kēr), s. [Eng. conquer; -ment.] A conquest, a victory.

"The nuns of new-won Calce his bonnet lent In lieu of their so kind a commendment." Sp. Hall, bk. III., l. 307.

cōn-quer-ōr (quer as kēr), * con-quer-our, * con-quer-ar, * con-quir-er, s. [O. Fr. conquereur; Sp. conquirador.] 1. One who gains or acquires anything by conquest.

"As conquerour of vche a cost he caysse watz halte." E. Eng. Allit. Poems; Cleanesse, 1, 523.

2. One who acquires or gains in any war.

"For to be a conquerour of worldes good." Gower, l. 322.

3. One who overcomes or subdues; a victor, a vanquisher.

"Increasing commerce and reviving art Renew the quarrel on the conqueror's part." Gower: On Servitium.

¶ The epithet la especially applied to William of Normandy, who conquered England in 1066. According to some William is improperly called the Conqueror; for, though victorious in battle, he had to come under an engagement to observe the laws of the realm before obtaining the crown. But this is not uncommon with conquerors. Speaking of what we usually call, though somewhat improperly, the right of conquest, Blackstone says that it is "a right allowed by the law of nations, if not by that of nature; but which in reason and civil polity can mean nothing more than that, in order to put an end to hostilities, a compact is either expressly or tacitly made between the conqueror and the conquered that, if they will acknowledge the victor for their master, he will treat them for the future as subjects and not as enemies." (Blackstone: Comment., introd., § 4.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between conqueror and victor: "A conqueror is always supposed to add something to his possessions; a victor gains nothing but the superiority; there is no conquest where there is no something gotten; there is no victory where there is no contest; all conquerors are not victors, nor all victors conquerors: those who take possession of other men's lands by force of arms make a conquest; those who excel in any trial of skill are the victors." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cōn-quer-ōus (quer as kēr), a. [Eng. conquer; -ous.] Conquering, victorious.

"The conquerous horse unclenke and unmindfull of his gaine." Flemings: Virgils, Georgick III., p. 83.

* con-ques, * con-queas, v.t. [CONQUACE, v.]

* con-que-se, s. [CONQUACE, a.]

* cōn-quest, v.t. [O. Fr. conquesten.] To conquer, to subdue.

"Nabegoneuar makes much ioye. Nov he the kyng hatz conquest." E. Eng. Allit. Poems; Cleanesse, 1, 504.

cōn-quest, s. [O. Fr. conquest; Fr. conquête, from Lat. conquestus, neut. pa. par. of conquiro; Sp. & Ital. conquiste.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of conquering, subduing, or acquiring by force.

"The last and hardest conquest of the mind." Pope: Homer's Odyssey, bk. xiii., l. 354.

* 3. The act or process of acquiring or gaining in any way; acquisition.

4. That which is acquired or gained by victory or force.

"Tru he was and wise and kind, O thair conquest he toke the tend." Curior Mundi, 2, 559.

5. The act of gaining the affections of any person.

"Wrinkles, or a small stoop in the shoulders, may, even gray hairs, be no objection to making new conquests." M. W. Montague: Lett., No. 11.

6. A person whose affections are gained.

II. Technically:

1. Hist.: The term "the Conquest" is applied to a revolution in British history following on the defeat of Harold II. by William, Duke of Normandy, in 1066, which reduced the Saxons for a century and more to the position of a subject and oppressed race, land, power, everything having been transferred to the Normans. [CONQUEROR.]

2. Feudal & Scots Law: (See extract).

"What we call purchase, perquisitio, the feudists called conquest, conquestus, or conquistio; both denoting any means of acquiring an estate out of the common course of inheritance. And this is still the proper phrase in the law of Scotland: as it was among the Norman jurists, who styled the first purchaser (that is he who brought the estate into the family who at present owns it) the conqueror or conquerer. Which seems to be all that was meant by the appellation which was given to William the Norman."—Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. II., ch. xv.

* con-quest-ōr, * con-quest-our, s. [Eng. conquest; -or.] A conqueror, a victor.

* con-quire, v.t. [CONQUER.]

"Stoutly concerning Their lives and soules to God, in suffering." Synester: Du Bartas; Triumph of Faith, III. 2.

* cōn-sā-crēd, a. [CONSACRE, v.] Consecrated, dedicated.

"There was a Peach-tree growing there amid God-Camos Temple, to him consecrad." Synester: Du Bartas; Maiden's Blush, 672.

* con-sail, v.t. [COUNSEL, v.]

* cōn-sān-guin'-ē-al, a. [Lat. consanguinialis = of the same blood.] The same as CONSANGUINEOUS (q.v.).

* cōn-sān-guinē, a. [Lat. con = cum = with, together; sanguis (genit. sanguinis) = blood; Eng. suff. -ed.] Related by blood.

cōn-sān-guin'-ē-ōus, a. [Lat. consanguineus, from con = cum = with, together, and sanguineus = full of blood, bloody; sanguis (genit. sanguinis) = blood.] Of the same blood; related by birth; descended from a common ancestor; near of kin.

"Am not I consanguineous I am I not of her blood!"—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, II. 2.

cōn-sān-guin'-i-tū, s. [Lat. consanguinitas, from con = cum = with, together, and sanguis = blood.] The quality or state of being related by blood; nearness of kin; descent from a common ancestor.

" . . . connected by consanguinity or affinity with several others, . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

¶ Consanguinity is of two kinds, lineal and collateral. Lineal subsists among persons who descend in what may be called a straight line from a common ancestor: thus grandfather, father, son, grandson, great grandson have lineal consanguinity. Collateral consanguinity is when there is descent from a common ancestor, but not in a direct line: as grandfather, father, his brother, son of the first, &c., &c. Here the line is not direct. If A. has two sons, each of whom has children, these children are related to each other by consanguinity. Consanguinity, which is of Latin origin, is nearly the same as kindred, which is Anglo-Saxon.

cōn-sar-çin-āte, v.t. [Lat. consarcinatus, pa. par. of consarcino, to patch together.] To patch, to botch.

* cōn-sar-çin-ā-tion, s. [Eng. consarcinatio; -ation.] The act of piecing or patching together; patchwork.

* con-schaft, * con-schafft, s. [Jamieson suggests Flem. kundschap.] Knowledge, information, information.

"He must also direct parties on all quarters of horsemen to get intelligence, and conschaft of his enemies, lest unawares he should be surpris'd."—Moor: Exped., P. I., p. 2.

cōn-science (so as sh), * con-science, * con-scien-s, * con-science, * kun-science, s. [Fr. conscience; Lat. conscientia = (1) a joint knowledge, a being privy to, a witnessing; or, by metonymy, the persons who are privy to anything; (2) consciousness, knowledge, feeling; (3) the moral sense, conscience, of wrongs; pr. par. of conscio = to be conscious (of wrong); conscientus = one enigmatised of; con = together, and scio = to know, to understand, to perceive.]

"What we call purchase, perquisitio, the feudists called conquest, conquestus, or conquistio; both denoting any means of acquiring an estate out of the common course of inheritance. And this is still the proper phrase in the law of Scotland: as it was among the Norman jurists, who styled the first purchaser (that is he who brought the estate into the family who at present owns it) the conqueror or conquerer. Which seems to be all that was meant by the appellation which was given to William the Norman."—Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. II., ch. xv.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of mental states or operations:

2. Of moral feeling:

(1) The moral sense. As the etymology indicates, it signifies "knowledge along with"—but whether with a thing, or a person or being, it is difficult to determine. South makes it with a thing. He says, in his sermons: "Conscience, according to the very notation of it, importing a double or joint knowledge; to wit, one of a divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action; and so is properly the application of a general law to a particular instance of practice." (South.) It may, however, be along with God. Paul uses it in this sense in Rom. ix. i. [II. 1.]

"... a conscience which indeed too often failed to restrain him from doing wrong, but which never failed to punish him."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

(2) The decision or the impulse of conscience, morality.

* (3) A point of conscience, in sense 2 (1).

"We must make a conscience in keeping the just laws of superiors."—Taylor: Holy Living.

† (1) A bad conscience: A reproving conscience, a conscience which at the moment is reproaching one for a fault or crime.

(2) A good conscience: An approving conscience, a conscience which at the moment is producing delight in the heart on account of some good deed recently done.

(3) A seared conscience: A conscience which by being habitually disregarded has now lost its sensitiveness, as flesh, when its nerves have been destroyed by being cauterised, ceases to feel. The phrase is founded on 1 Tim. iv. 2, "... having their conscience seared with a hot iron."

(4) A tender conscience: A conscience which is very sensitive to moral considerations. It is the exact opposite of a seared conscience.

"A preliminary question, which perplexed tender consciences, was submitted to the Bishops."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

(5) In all conscience: In all reason, in truth, really, truly.

"... many of his travelling experiences were sufficiently exciting in all conscience."—Times, Jan. 20, 1877.

(6) In conscience: Nearly the same as in all conscience, but not quite so strong an expression.

"What you require cannot, in conscience, be deferred beyond this time."—Hilton.

(7) Out of all conscience: Unconscionable, unreasonable.

II. Technically:

1. Mental Phil. & Ethics: The moral sense, the internal monitor which signifies approval when we do well, and inflicts more or less acute and lasting pain when we set sinfully. It is generally held to be the Vicegerent of God, or, as Byron calls it, the Oracle of God, letting us know what the Divine Judgment on our conduct is; but here the difficulty arises, that the indications of the conscience are often wrong. Saul was conscientious when he took part in the cruel martyrdom of Stephen and subsequently persecuted the Christians, but, in popular phrase, his conscience was not enlightened. This suggests that conscience is not a simple but a complex part of our nature. In its decisions there mingles first an operation of fallible intellect judging of conduct, then follows an emotional part generating the satisfaction or the dissatisfaction produced by that judgment. In this case the emotional part would be the Vicegerent of God, and unerring, such mistakes of reasoning as might be committed being those of the intellect. Moral sensibility may be blunted by neglect of the monitorings of conscience, till at length it scarcely operates, the state being reached in which, to use Scripture phraseology, "the conscience is seared as with a hot iron." [I. 2 (1)(3).]

2. Mech.: A plate resting against the drill-head and enabling the pressure of the breast or hand to be brought upon the drill; a palette. (Knight.)

† Courts of Conscience:

Law: Courts of request established by the London Common Council to be used for the recovery of small debts. They arose at least as early as A.D. 1517; they were superseded by County Courts, established in 1846 by 9 and 10 Vict. c. 95.

conscience clause, s.

Law & Education: A clause designed to protect the conscience of a child or of the parents from being subjected to religious teaching of which the latter disapprove. It was first introduced into the Endowed Schools Act of conscience-money, s. Money forwarded, as a rule anonymously, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for unpaid income-tax. In most cases the sender intentionally underestimated his income when filling in his return on the subject, but subsequently repented. It amounts to some thousand pounds a year.

conscience-proof, a. Proof against the monitions and the reproofs of conscience.

conscience-scrupled, a. Conscientious.

"Conscience-scrupled or spiced. Berapulus."—Huloot.

conscience-smitten, a. Smitten by conscience on account of some misdeed.

con-scienclē (sc as sh), a. in compos. [CONSCIENCE.] Having a conscience of the kind indicated by the word prefixed to it.

"Though soft-conscienced men can be content to say it was for his country, he did it to please his mother."—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 1.

con-science-less (sc as sh), a. [Eng. conscience, and suff. -less.] Without conscience, disregarding the moral law, or the dictates of conscience.

"Even conscienceless and wicked patrons."—Hooker: Ecclesiastical Polity, bk. vii., § 24.

† con-scient (scient as shyent), a. [Lat. sciens, pr. par. of scio = to know along with: con=together, and scio to know.] Conscientious.

"As if he were conscient to himself, that he had played his part well upon the stage."—Bacon: On Learning.

* con-scien-tion-āl (scien as shi-ēn), a. [Formed from Eng. conscience, on analogy of other adjectives.] Conscientious, depending on the conscience.

"And so let it rest... a conscientious, accidental event."—Gaulle: Mag-astro-mancers, p. 108.

con-scien-tious (scien as shi-ēn, and tious as shūs), a. [Fr. conscientieux (m.), conscienceuse (f.); Lat. conscientia.] [CONSCIENCE.]

1. Subjectively: Regulating one's conduct by conscience; scrupulously moral.

"It is seldom that a man enrolls himself in a prescribed body from any but conscientious motives."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. Objectively: Inspired by conscience.

"For faithful we must call them, bearing That soul of conscientious daring." Wordsworth: The White Doe of Rylstone, canto II.

† Crabbs thus discriminates between conscientious and scrupulous: "Conscientious is to scrupulous as a whole to a part. A conscientious man is so altogether; a scrupulous man may have only particular scruples: the one is therefore always taken in a good sense; and the other at least in an indifferent, if not a bad sense. A conscientious man does nothing to offend his conscience; but a scrupulous man has often his scruples on trifling or minor points: the Pharisees were scrupulous without being conscientious; we must therefore strive to be conscientious without being over scrupulous." (Crabbs: Eng. Synon.) con-scien-tious-ly (scien as shi-ēn, and tious as shūs), adv. [Eng. conscientious -ly.] In a conscientious manner, under, or as if under, the operation of conscience.

1. Of man.

"The views adopted by the author in early days he still conscientiously maintains."—Moman: Hist. of Jesus, 2nd ed., Pref., vol. I. pp. 7, vi.

† 2. Of the inferior animals.

"... another monkey sitting by 'conscientiously' examines its fur and extracts every thorn or burr." Darwin: The Descent of Man (1871), pt. I, ch. iii., vol. I., p. 75.

con-scien-tious-nēss (scien as shi-ēn, and tions as shūs), s. [Eng. conscientious; -ness.] The quality of being conscientious; tenderness of conscience.

con-scion-a-ble (scion as shūn), a. [A contr. of conscienceable.] Governed or regulated by conscience; reasonable, just. (Seldom now used except in the negative compound unconscionable.)

"Conscienceable, or hautyng a good conscience. Re-lygiouse."—Huloot.

* con-scion-a-ble-nēss (scion as shūn), a. [Eng. conscienceable; -ness.] The quality of being conscienceable; reasonableness, justness.

con-scion-a-ble-ly, * con-scion-a-ble (scion as shūn) adv. [Eng. conscienceable(-ly).] In a conscienceable, reasonable, or just manner; according to conscience. (Seldom used except in the negative compound unconscionably.)

"Conscionably, or wryth a good conscience. Re-lygiouse."—Huloot.

con-scious (scious as shūs), a. [Lat. sciens = aware, cognizant of, privy to: con = together, and scio = to know.]

I. Subjectively:

1. Feeling or aware of one's own existence. Used—

(1) Gen.: Of the normal state of man or any other being so endowed.

"Matter hath no life nor perception, and is not conscious of its own existence."—Bentley: Sermone.

(2) Spec.: In speaking of one diseased or injured, when it is opposed to unconscious.

2. Feeling or aware by means of sensation of anything at the moment affecting that existence.

(1) Formerly it was sometimes followed by to.

"Æneas only, conscious to the sign." Dryden: Virgil; Æn. viii. 701.

(2) Now of is the appropriate word.

(3) Or a clause of a sentence may follow, introduced by that.

"... a tenderness which he was conscious that he had not merited."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxii.

(4) Or it may be used reflexively.

"The queen had been sollicitous with the king on his behalf, being conscious to herself that he had been encouraged by her."—Clarendon.

(5) Or it may stand alone.

"Thou wilt deserv't an alienated son, Unless thy conscious heart acknowledge none." Cowper: Tirocinium.

II. Objectively: Known by means of internal feeling, as "conscious guilt."

† For the difference between to be conscious and to feel, see FEEL.

con-scious-ly (scious as shūs), a. [Eng. conscious; -ly.] In a conscious manner, with more or less of attention to one's state, feelings, thoughts, or actions.

"... a fine young man of twenty, but who was consequently dying of asthma."—De Quincy: Works (ed. 1858), vol. II., p. 129.

con-scious-nēss (scious as shūs), s. [Eng. conscious; -ness.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In a strict sense:

(1) Gen.: Internal feeling; the state of being aware of one's sensations.

(2) Spec.: Internal, more or less remorseless, feeling of guilt, or pleasurable feeling of innocence.

"The consciousness of wrong brought with it the consciousness of weakness."—Proude: Hist. Eng. (1858), 2nd ed., vol. III., ch. xvii., p. 488.

2. In a loose sense: Memory, remembrance.

† Consciousness may be followed by of (see 1 (2), ex.), or by a clause of a sentence introduced by that; or it may be reflexive.

"Such ideas, no doubt, they would have had, had not their consciousness to themselves of their ignorance of them kept them from so idle an attempt."—Locke.

II. Mental, Phil.: The power, faculty, or mental state of being aware of one's own existence, condition at the moment, thoughts, feelings, and actions.

con-sci-ū-ēle (sci as shi), s. [A contemptuous diminutive of Eng. & a. conscience, the suffix from Lat. dimin. in -uiculus.] An over-scrupulous conscience.

"Their rubrics are filled with pantheism, not for consciences but consciences."—Bauck: Williams.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pēt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, quite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ. ce = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

* con-scribe, v.t. [Lat. conscribo.] To enroll, to enlist, to levy by conscription.

"The arms (which was not small) was conscribed, and came together to Harlech. . . —Hall: Edward IV. The ninth Year. (Rich.)

con-script, * con-scripte, a. & s. [Lat. conscriptus, pa. par. of conscribo = to write together, to enroll: con = cum = with, together, and scribo = to write.]

A. As adj.: Enrolled, registered, or written down.

¶ The Senators of Rome were styled Patres Conscripti; properly, Patres et Conscripti. (See extract.)

"Such as were chosen into the senate by Brutus, after the expulsion of Tarquin the Proud, to supply the place of those whom that King had slain were called Conscripti, i. e., persons written or enrolled together with the old senators, who also were properly styled patres."—Adam: Rom. Antiq.

B. As subst.: A person enrolled in an army by conscription. (See instances under Con-scription.)

con-scrip-tion, * con-scrip-ti-oun, s. [Lat. conscriptio = a registering, an enrolling, from conscriptus, pa. par. of conscribo = to write together, to enroll.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A writing down, enrolling, or registering.

"Thet maiden the conscriptioun of the wedlok."—Wycliffe: Tobit, vii. 18.

2. Mil.: A compulsory enlisting or levying of soldiers.

"In 1798 General Jourdan presented to the Council of Five Hundred a project of a law for a new mode of recruiting, under the name of conscription."—National Cyclopedia of Useful Knowledge.

con-sé-crâte, v.t. [From Lat. consecratus, pa. par. of consecro = to make holy, to dedicate as sacred to a deity: con (intens.), and sacro = to set apart as sacred; sacer (m.), sacra (f.), sacrum (neut.) = sacred.]

1. Of setting apart:

(1) To set apart as sacred, to devote to the true God or to some false deity. (Used of persons [H. 1], of money, of times, of anything.)

"And Mosaic consecrated the Levites; and the young man became his priest. . . —Judges xvii. 12.

"He shall consecrate unto the Lord the days of his separation. . . —Num. vi. 12.

(2) To devote to a sacred or high purpose.

" . . . the Sabbath, and other days consecrated to religious duty. . . —Scott: The Chase.

2. Of rendering holy:

(1) Of a person: To canonize.

(2) Of a thing: To hallow, to make interesting in a high degree through the associations connected with it.

"A kiss can consecrate the ground, Where mated hearts are mutual bound."—Campbell: Hallowed Ground.

II. Technically:

* 1. Roman Antiq.: To defile. (Used of an emperor.)

2. Ecclesiology:

(1) Of a saint: To canonize.

(2) Of a bishop: With solemn ceremonies to set him apart to the sacred office which he is to fill.

¶ For the difference between consecrate and dedicate, see DEDICATE.

con-sé-crâte, a. [Lat. consecratus.] [CON-SEC-RATE, v.] Consecrated.

"To a mysteriously consecrated pair This place is consecrate; to death and life."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. v.

con-sé-crâ-téd, pa. par. & a. [CON-SEC-RATE, v.]

* con-sé-crâ-téd-ness, s. [Eng. consecrated; -ness.] The state of being consecrated.

con-sé-crâ-tîng, pr. par. & a. [CON-SEC-RATE, v.]

con-sé-crâ-tîon, * con-se-cra-ci-oun, * con-se-cra-cyon, s. [Fr. consecration; Prov. consecration; Sp. consecracion; Ital. consecrazione, all from Lat. consecratio = (1) religious dedication, (2) deification, especially of the Roman emperors, (3) a magical incantation.] [CON-SEC-RATE, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of consecrating; the state of being consecrated.

"And thou shalt take the breast of the ram of Aaron's consecration, and wave it for a wave offering before the Lord. . . —Exod. xxix. 22.

* 2. Things consecrated.

" . . . of consecrations, as I commanded, saying, Aaron and his sons shall eat it."—Lev. viii. 31.

II. Technically:

1. Ethnic Customs: Consecration of animals, priests, temples, &c., to the several divinities worshipped was and is common among the ethnic or pagan nations in all parts of the world.

2. Roman Antiq.: When the Roman emperors had the word consecratio applied to them, it meant that they were defiled and held to be entitled from that time forward to receive divine honours.

4. Christian Ecclesiol. & Church Hist.: Consecration may be resolved into two elements: (1) the dedication of persons or things to the service of God with appropriate ceremonies, (2) the formal declaration that in consequence of belonging to God they are now sacred; for, as South well remarks, "we must know that consecration makes not a place sacred, but only solemnly declares it so; the gift of the owner to God makes it God's, and consequently sacred." The term is used—

(1) Of persons:

(a) Spec.: Of the consecrating of bishops, priests, and deacons. In the Liturgy one of the headings is, "The form and manner of making, ordaining and consecrating of Bishops, Priests and Deacons;" and the thirty-sixth of the Thirty-nine Articles is entitled, "Of consecrating of Ministers."

(b) (In the Church of Rome): The canonization of a saint.

(2) Of things: It is used specially of the consecrating of churches. It was not till Christianity had existed for some little time that separate buildings were erected for Divine worship, ordinary rooms at first being used for the meetings of the faithful (Acts i. 13). When separate churches were built, some simple rite of consecration was almost sure to follow at once; and the ceremonies gradually became more numerous and striking, till, when Constantine established Christianity, they became splendid and imposing. They are still so in the Church of Rome, and to a less extent in the Church of England. The elements in the Holy Communion are also consecrated.

5. Law: When in England a church is consecrated by a bishop none but the worship of the Established Church can be permitted within its walls or precincts. Till lately, when a burial-ground was consecrated, none but the clergyman of the parish or his delegates could officiate within it; but the Burial Act of 1880 in certain cases removed the restriction. [BURIAL, A. II. 2.]

¶ There is a distinction between consecration, ordination, and dedication. The first is applied to persons or things, the second to persons only, the last to things. The term "consecration" is used of kings and bishops, the term ordination of ordinary clergymen or ministers; while dedication is used of temples, altars, &c.

con-sé-crâ-tôr, s. [Lat.] One who consecrates any person or dedicates any temple, altar, money, &c.

"Whether it be not against the notion of a sacrament, that the consecrator alone should partake of it."—Atterbury.

con-sé-crâ-tôr-y, a. [Eng. consecrator; -y.] Used in consecration.

"His words of consecration, which you yourself in your letter do rightly term true consecratory words. . . —Sp. Morton: Discharge, p. 82.

* con-séc-tân'-é-ous, a. [Lat. consecratorius, from consequor = to follow.] Following or deducible as a matter of course.

* con-séc-tar-y, a. & s. [Lat. consecrarius = following logically, consequent.]

A. As adj.: Consequent, following by natural sequence; consequential in a logical sense.

"From the inconsistent and contrary determinations thereof, consecratory impieties and conclusions may arise."—Brownie.

1. Logic: A following, a consequence, an inference or natural deduction, a chain or concatenation of deductions or propositions.

2. Astronomy:

The Month of Consecution: The lunar month.

con-séc-û-tive, a. & s. [Fr. consecutif (m.), consecutive (f.); Sp., Port., & Ital. consecutivo, from Lat. consecutus, pa. par. of consequor = to follow after: con = together, and sequor = to follow.]

A. As adj.: Following, successive, uninterrupted, without interval or break.

1. Standing alone:

"In the structure and order of the poem, not only the greater parts are properly consecutive. . . —Johnson: Life of Blackmore.

* 2. Followed by to:

"This is seeming to comprehend only the actions of a man, consecutive to volition."—Locke.

B. As substantive:

Music (Pl.): A forbidden progression of parallel fifths or octaves.

consecutive poles, s. pl.

Magnetism: Secondary poles formed at various parts of a magnetic bar. These, though feeble in their influence, yet tend to disturb the attraction and repulsion of the real poles.

consecutive symptoms, s. pl.

Med.: Symptoms near the beginning or end of a disease, but not connected with it very directly.

con-séc-û-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. consecutive; -ly.]

I. Ord. Lang.: In a consecutive manner, so as to follow something else.

II. Logic:

1. Consequently, as opposed to antecedently.

2. In a manner to indicate that it is an effect, as opposed to causally or effectively.

con-séc-û-tive-ness, s. [Eng. consecutive; -ness.] The quality or state of being consecutive—i. e., of following after something else. (Used chiefly of argument.)

* con-seil, v. [COUNSEL, v.]

C. Trans.: To agree or consent to; to submit, to admit.

"Interpreters ... will not consent it to be a true story."—Milton.

‡ Crabb thus distinguishes between to consent, to allow, and to permit: "The idea of determining the conduct of others by some authorized act of one's own is common to these terms, but under various circumstances. They express either the act of an equal or a superior. As the act of an equal we consent to that in which we have an interest; we permit or allow what is for the accommodation of others: we allow by abstaining to oppose; we permit by a direct expression of our will; contracts are formed by the consent of the parties who are interested. The proprietor of an estate permits his friends to sport on his grounds; he allows of a passage through his premises. It is sometimes prudent to consent; complaisant to permit; good natured or weak to allow. When applied to superiors, consent is an act of private authority; permit and allow are acts of private or public authority: in the first case, consent respects matters of serious importance; permit and allow regard those of an indifferent nature: a parent consents to the establishment of his children; he permits them to read certain books; he allows them to converse with him familiarly." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

† cōn-sēm-ta-nē-ī-tŷ, s. [Formed as if from a Lat. consentantia, from consentianus.] The being of one mind or consent; mutual agreement.

"... the consentianity or even privity of Prussia."—Times, Jan. 18, 1854.

B. As adj.: Assenting in opinion; of the same mind, complying.

C. As subst.: The act of agreeing, acquiescing, or assenting; consent.

* cōn-sēm-t-ŋŋ-lŷ, adv. [Eng. consenting; -ly.] In a consenting manner; with consent or concurrence.

* cōn-sēm-t-mēt, *con-sente-men, s. [Eng. consent; -ment.] Consent, concurrence, acquiescence.

cōn-sē-ŋeŋce, s. [Fr. conséquence; Lat. consequētia, from consequens, pr. par. of consequor = to follow with.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

- 1. That which follows as the result or effect of any cause.
- "... you see the consequence of such neglect."—Goldsmith: Essays, II.
- 2. A concatenation or consecution of causes and effects.
- "... must by necessary consequence, bring in sorrow too."—South.
- 3. That which produces an effect.

II. Figuratively:

- 1. Importance; having an influence or effect upon; moment.
- "The place of the perihelion of a planet's orbit is of little consequence to its well-being..."—Herschel: Astronomy, 8th ed. (1858), p. 701.
- 2. Rank, consideration, importance.
- "Beware of too exalting a sense Of your own worth and consequence."—Cowper: Mors to Poem of Retired Out.
- 3. Pride, conceit, vanity.

B. Technically:

I. Logic:

- 1. A deduction, a conclusion, an inference drawn from preceding propositions.
- "This once believed, 'twere logic misapplied To prove a consequence by none denied."—Cowper: Tirocinium.
- 2. The last proposition of a syllogism.
- "Can syllogism set things right? No, majore soon with minore fight; Or, both in friendly consort join'd, The consequence limps false behind."—Prior.

II. Games (Pl.): The name of a child's game, somewhat like cross-readings.

"Playing at cards or consequences."—Miss Austen: Sense and Sensibility, ch. xxiii.

‡ (1) By consequence: Consequently, as a necessary result or effect.

(2) In consequence of: By reason of, through.

"In consequence of which, your welcome boon Did not arrive till yesterday at noon."—Cowper: To Mrs. Newton.

(3) Of consequence: Consequently, as a necessary result or effect.

"A contagion more epidemic, and, of consequence, more fatal."—Swift: Against Punning.

‡ Crabb thus discriminates between consequence and result: "Consequences flow of themselves from the nature of things; results are drawn. Consequences proceed from actions in general; results proceed from particular efforts and attempts. Consequences are good or bad; results are successful or unsuccessful. We endeavour to avert consequences which threaten to be bad; we endeavour to produce results that are according to our wishes. Not to foresee the consequences which are foreseen by others, evinces a more than ordinary share of indiscretion and infatuation. To calculate on a favourable result from an ill-judged and ill-executed enterprise, only proves a consistent blindness in the projector." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

‡ For the difference between consequence and effect, see EFFECT; for that between consequence and event, see EVENT; for that between consequence and importance, see IMPORTANCE.

* cōn-sē-ŋeŋce, v.t. [CONSEQUENCE, s.] To draw inferences or conclusions.

¶ Conservation of energy, t force, or vis viva.

Nat. Phil.: The general principle that energy communicated to a body or system of bodies is never lost; it is merely distributed and continues to exist as potential energy, as motion or as heat. Faraday directed attention to the subject, Grove elaborately treated it, and it now stands as one of the axioms of physics. It is sometimes called correlation of forces. [CORRELATION.]

"We, moreover, speak of the conservation of energy instead of the conservation of force."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd. ed.), I. 23.

côn-sêr-va-tion-ăl, a. [Eng. conservation; -al.] Tending to conserve. (Nuttall.)

côn-sêr-va-ti-ôn, s. [Eng. conservative; -ism.] The political tenets advocated by the Conservatives—viz., the preservation of the present British constitution and the institutions of the country, especially the monarchy, the House of Lords, the Established Church of England, and, as a buttress to it, that of Scotland. "The movement against the last king of the House of Stuart was in England conservatism, in Scotland destructive."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

B. As substantive:

1. Singular:

(1) Gen.: A person or Being who conserves or preserves anything; a preserver.

"The Holy Spirit is the great conservative of the new life."—Jeremy Taylor: Of Confirmation, fol. 21.

(2) Spec.: One belonging to the party described under 2, or holding similar convictions in any other state.

2. Pl. (Conservatives): One of the two great political parties in England and the British empire. In every society which has ever existed one large section of the community has been led by mental constitution, by its position in society, or by other causes, to deprecate change, unless where the necessity for it can be proved by irrefragable evidence. Others, from the same causes, tend to become a party of movement, and on much less proof of its necessity than that which the first would deem sufficient, advocate change and what they deem reform. Though both parties are needful to the healthy political life of the country, yet each is disposed to regard the other as its mortal foe. Each has a central organization, besides an immense number of local societies scattered over the country. The prominent spirits of each party are never long at rest, but seek every opportunity of advocating their views. Perhaps one-eighth of the community have pronounced political views, and are able to explain why they hold them; the remainder constitute an inert mass of no strong political convictions, but this swaying first to one side and then to the other, successively puts each party in power. The national obligations entered into by the one are scrupulously respected by the other, even though it may at first have opposed their being formed. Both these parties consented for many years to be known only by nicknames, which caricatured their failings—the party which, speaking broadly, resisted change being stigmatized by the nickname Tory, and that which advocated it by Whig. Neither term was of English origin: the term Tory [TORV] came originally from Ireland, and Whig [WHIO] from Scotland. It was inevitable that sooner or later these names should be exchanged for others of a more complimentary character, and accordingly the "Tories" called themselves "Conservatives," and the "Whigs" assumed the title of "Liberals." For the first employment of the term, see Conservative Party. It was suggested that their opponents were the Destructive party, but the name was unjust and was soon forgotten. Lord Beaconsfield attempted to revert to the old name Tory, but his followers did not take kindly to it, and the word was left to his opponents to use. Constitutionalism was also proposed as a substitute for it, but the use of that new term did not long continue.

The first French revolution being in the earlier stages everywhere welcomed with enthusiasm by the party of progress, the reign of terror so discredited that party that it placed power in the hands of the Conservatives for about forty years. The strong Liberal movement which produced the first Reform Bill terminated its rule for the time. Since then it has been in office for the following periods: Under Sir Robert Peel, from December 26, 1834, to April 18, 1835, and again from September 6, 1841, to July 6, 1846; under the Earl of Derby from February 27, 1852, to December 28 of the same year; from February 25, 1858, to June 18, 1859; and again from July 6, 1866, to February 27, 1868; under Benjamin Disraeli, afterwards Lord Beaconsfield, from February 27, 1868, to December 27 of the same year; and from February 21, 1874, to April 28, 1880; under the Marquis of Salisbury, from June 24, 1885, to February 6, 1886, and from August 3, 1886, to August 16, 1892, when Mr. Gladstone took office. [CONSERVATISM.]

¶ (1) Conservative Club: A club founded in London in 1840. The mansion in St. James Street which it occupies was opened on February 10, 1845.

(2) Conservative party:

Political Hist.: The name given by Mr. John Wilson Croker in 1830 to the great party in the State previously known as the Tory party. [B, 2.] [See also TORV.]

"... we are now, as we always have been, decidedly and conscientiously attached to what is called the Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative party."—Qu. Rev., vol. xiii, No. 33 (Jan. 1830), p. 278.

3. Old Scots Law of Comm.: An officer appointed under the Scottish Act, 1503, to reside at Campvere, in the Netherlands, and settle cases arising among the Scottish merchants carrying on their business there. On the erection of the Court of Session in 1532, it claimed a cumulative jurisdiction in causes cognisable by the conservator. He was sometimes called the Conservator of the Staple.

¶ (1) Conservators of the Peace:

Law & Hist.: Officers appointed by the common law to see that the peace is kept. They were originally of two kinds. Those who held other offices than this, and aided in keeping the peace in virtue of their possessing such offices. To this category belonged the King, the Lord Chancellor, the High Constable, and other dignitaries. A second kind were those who had no other function. In 1300 they received the power of trying felonies, and obtained the name of Justices of the Peace. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. 1, ch. 9.)

(2) Conservator of the Staple: [CONSERVATOR, II. 3].

(3) Conservators of Truce and Safe Conducts:

Law & Hist.: Officers appointed at every passport to hear and decide on charges regarding the breaking of truces and safe conducts, or abetting and receiving the truce-breakers. By 2 Hen. V. 1, c. 6, such offences were made treason.

¶ Crabh thua discriminates between to consider and to regard: "... There is most caution in considering; most attention in regarding. The circumstances, situation, advantages, disadvantages, and the like, are objects of consideration; personal character, abilities, and qualities, are objects of regard. A want of consideration leads a person to form a very unfair judgment of others; a want of regard makes them regardless of their comfort, convenience, and respectability. We ought to have a consideration for all who are in our service, not to demand more of them than what we may reasonably expect; we ought at all times to have a regard for our own credit and respectability, among those who are witnesses of our conduct." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cons - sid' - er - a - bil' - y - tŷ, s. [Eng. considerable; -ity.] The quality of being considerable or capable of being considered.

4. Of some size, amount, or quality; moderately large or great.

"The weight of France, therefore, though still very considerable, has relatively diminished." - Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. II.

B. As subst.: A matter or point worthy of consideration.

"For the same there are two considerations: the notion made on the brain, and the soul's act consequent thereupon, which we call animal-verstee." - Glanville: Pan. of Dogm., ch. viii.

cons - sid' - er - a - ble - ness, s. [Eng. considerable; -ness.] The quality of being worthy of consideration.

(1) In importance, moment, or weight.

"Nor doth all the glory that riseth out of them, to him, rise up to a consideration in comparison of what shall, and doth, out of us..." - Goodwin: Works, vol. II, pt. IV, p. 96.

(2) In size, extent, or amount.

"... to the smallness of the worth of their livings, and to the considerableness of income they yield the impatience." - Boyle: Works, vol. I, p. 166. 4 pp. to the title.

cons - sid' - er - a - ble, adv. [Eng. considerable; -ly.]

1. In a manner or degree deserving of consideration.

"I desire no sort of favour so much, as that of serving you more considerably than I have been yet able to do." - Pope.

2. Greatly; to a great extent.

"To regard to ducks and rabbits, the breeds of which differ considerably from each other in structure." - Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. I, p. 12.

cons - sid' - er - ance, s. [Eng. consider; -ance.] Consideration, reflection, or deliberation.

"After this cold consideration, sentence me." - Shakespeare: Henry IV, v. 2.

cons - sid' - er - ate, a. [Lat. consideratus, pa. par. of considero.]

1. Thoughtful; given to consideration and reflection; serious.

"The expediency, in the present juncture, may appear to every considerate man." - Addison.

2. Serious, sober, expressive of thought or reflection.

"Benm mark'd my unsuccessful pains With fix'd considerate face." - Cooper: Dog and Water Lily.

3. Quiet, calm, careful.

"I went the next day secretly, unto a high decayed piece of a turret, upon the wall over the haven, to take a considerate view thereof." - Sir H. Blount: Voyage to the Levant, p. 106.

4. Having a regard to or consideration for; regardful (followed by the preposition of).

"Though they will do nothing for virtue, yet they may be presumed more considerate of praise." - Dr. H. More: Decay of Christian Piety.

5. Characterized by a consideration for the feelings or situation of others; thoughtful.

"It will be the business of a just and refined nature to be sincere and considerate at the same time." - Helpe: Friends in Council, I. 15.

¶ For the difference between considerate and thoughtful, see THOUGHTFUL.

cons - sid' - er - ate - ly, adv. [Eng. considerate; -ly.]

1. After due consideration or reflection; not hastily or rashly; seriously.

1. The quality of being considerate, prudent, or thoughtful.

2. The quality of having a consideration or regard for the feelings of others.

"Your considerateness and bounty will make you faithful ones [attendants] wherever you go."—Macaulay: Charles, vol. iii., let. xxiii.

cón-síd-ér-á-tion. * cón-syd-er-a-cyon, s. [Fr. consideration; Ital. considerazione; from Lat. consideratio, from considero = to consider (q.v.)]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of considering, reflecting, or seriously deliberating on.

2. Careful attention, thought, or deliberation; care, prudence.

"These facts are in perfect accordance with another fact which seems to deserve consideration."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

3. Contemplation or meditation. (Followed by the preposition of.)

"Moses, having his mind fixed upon him who is invisible, acted more from the consideration of him whom he could not see, than of him whom he saw to be highly displeas'd with him."—Stillingfleet, vol. iii., ser. 1.

4. An examination, enquiry, or investigation into anything.

5. The result of examination, deliberation, or meditation; reflections, thoughts.

"... a little tract entitled 'Considerations on the Choice of a Speaker'..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

6. Thought, regard, attention, or respect for the feelings or opinions of others.

"... unless the House should, out of consideration for him, be disposed to retain them."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

7. A respectful expression of regard.

8. That which is considered or reflected on; a motive or ground of action or conduct.

"The consideration, in regard whereof the law forbiddeth these things, was not because those nations did use them."—Hooker.

9. A point or matter to be considered or taken into account.

"... by what considerations the applicability of the principle is bounded."—J. & Mill: Polit. Econ. (1896), vol. 1, bk. II, ch. II, § 1, p. 258.

10. The ground or reason for a conclusion.

"Not led by any commandment, yet moved with such considerations as have been before set down."—Hooker.

11. A claim to notice or regard; importance, worth, consequence.

"... bears of high consideration..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

12. A reward, recompense, or payment for any act done.

"We are provident enough not to part with any thing servicable to our bodies under a good consideration, but make little account of our souls."—Ray: On the Creation.

13. An equivalent.

"Foreigners can never take our bills for payment, though they might pass as valuable considerations among your own people."—Locke.

II. Law: (See extract).

"Consideration is the material cause of a contract, without which no contract bindeth. It is either expressed, as if a man bargain to give twenty shillings for a horse; or else implied, as when a man comes into an inn, and taking both meat and lodging for himself and his horse, without bargaining with the host, if he discharge not the house, the host may stay his horse."—Cowel.

¶ 1. To take into consideration:

(1) To consider, to reflect on, to weigh.

(2) To pay attention or regard to as a matter deserving of consideration.

"... they took into consideration another matter of high importance."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

2. In consideration: Considering, taking into account.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between consideration and reflection: "Consideration is employed for practical purposes; reflection for matters of speculation or moral improvement. Common objects call for consideration: the workings of the mind itself, or objects purely spiritual, occupy reflection."

(2) He thus discriminates between consideration and reason: "Considerations influence our actions; they are a species of motives; reason determines our belief or our conduct. Considerations are restrictive or negative; reasons are positive. We may have powerful considerations for forbearing to act, and powerful reasons for adopting one line of conduct in preference to another. Considerations are almost always personal, affecting either our own interest or that of others; reasons are general, and vary according to the nature of the subject. No consideration of profit or advantage should induce a person to forfeit his word. The reasons which men assign for their conduct are often as absurd as they are false." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cón-síd-ér-a-tive, a. [Eng. considerat(e); -ive.] Given or inclined to reflection; thoughtful, contemplative.

* cón-síd-ér-a-tór, s. [Lat.] One who considers or reflects; a considerer.

1. Reflected on; devoted to reflection.

"And at our more consider'd time we'll read.

Answer, and think upon this business."—Shaksp.: Hamlet, II. 2.

2. Thought of, estimated, looked upon.

¶ All things considered: After a careful weighing of and reflecting on all the circumstances of any case.

cón-síd-ěr-ěr, s. [Eng. consider; -er.] One who is given to consideration and reflection.

cón-síd-ěr-íng, pr. par., a., s., & prep. or conj. [CONSIDER.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adj.: Reflective, reasoning.

"... yet after so long a tract of time, the scripture must, by considering men, be consolet to speak not only properly, but often politely and elegantly to the present age."—Dr. H. More: Government of the Tongue, sec. II., § 12.

C. As subst.: The act of taking into consideration; reflecting or seriously thinking; consideration.

His thoughts are below the moon, not worth His serious considering."

Shaksp.: Henry VIII., III. 2.

D. As prep. or conj.: Taking into consideration, making allowance for.

"It is not possible to act otherwise, considering the weakness of our nature."—Speotator.

¶ A considering cap: A state or appearance of consideration, meditation, or reflection.

"Now I'll put on my considering cap."—Beaumont and Flot.: Loyal Subject.

* cón-síd-ěr-íng-ly, adv. [Eng. considering; -ly.] In a serious manner; with deep thought or consideration; without haste or rashness.

"... read them considering over..."—Whole Duty of Man: Heads of Self-Exam.

cón-sígn' (g silent), v.t. & i. [Fr. consigner; Ital. consegnare; Sp. consignar, from Lat. consigno = to seal, to attest: con = cum = with, together, and signo = to seal; signum = a seal.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

* (1) To sign or mark with a sign.

"... consigning them with holy chrism..."—Styrie: Records, No. 85, Judgment of Buckmaster.

* (2) To confirm, to assure.

"For my father hath consign'd and confirmed me with his assured testimony..."—Tyndall: Works, p. 457.

(3) To hand over, to deliver formally or by deed.

"Men, by free gift, consign over a place to the Divine worship."—South.

(4) To commit, to transfer.

"Hopeless as they who, far et cœa, By the cold moon have just consign'd The core of one, loved tenderly, To the bleak flood they leave behind."

Moor's: Latta Book; Five Worshipers.

(5) To yield, to give up, to surrender, to resign.

(3) To give in charge, to entrust.

"Atrides, parting for the Trojæ war, Consign'd the youthful consort to his care."—Pope: Odyssey.

* (4) To appropriate, to apply to a certain purpose, to assign.

"The French commander consign'd it to the use for which it was intended by the donor."—Dryden: Pables; Dedica.

(5) To condemn, to give up to a certain state.

"... put their souls to the packet which consigns every new-born sinner to oblivion."—Goldsmith: The Bee, No. v.; Of Reverie.

II. Technically:

* 1. Eccles.: To mark or sign with the sign of the cross.

"To baptize we are admitted to the kingdom of Christ, presented unto him, sign'd with his sacrament."—Bp. Taylor: Great Exemplar, pt. I., Dia. 6.

2. Comm.: To hand over or entrust to an agent goods for disposal or superintendence.

* B. Intransitive:

1. To consent, to agree.

"... a maid yet rosed over with the virgin crimson of modesty..." It were... a hard condition for a maid to consign to."—Shaksp.: Henry V., v. 2.

2. To yield, to submit, to give way.

"All lovers young, all lovers must Consign to thee, and come to dust."—Shaksp.: Song to Cymbeline.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between consign, to commit, and to entrust: "The idea of transferring from one's self to the care of another is common to these terms. What is consign'd is either given absolutely away from one's self, or only conditionally for one's own purpose: what is committed or entrusted is given conditionally. A person consigns his property over to another by a deed in law; a merchant consigns his goods to another, to dispose of them for his advantage; he commits the management of his business to his clerks, and entrusts them with the care of his property. Consign expresses a more positive measure than commit, and commit than entrust. When a child is consign'd to the care of another, it is an unconditional surrender of one's trust into the hands of another; but any person may be committed to the care of another with various limitations; and when he is entrusted to his care, it is both a partial and temporary matter, referring mostly to his personal safety, and that only for a limited time." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cón-sígn-na-tar-ý, s. [Lat. consignatus, pa. par. of consigno.] One to whom goods are consign'd or entrusted; a consignee.

2. A strengthening or rendering firm.

B. Technically:

1. Geol.: The rendering of strata harder and more stony. [A. I. 1.] As a rule the older rocks are more consolidated and therefore more stony than those of comparatively modern date, but there are numerous exceptions to this rule. Some, such as calcareous and silicious deposits, were hard from the first. Among those which were originally soft, the solidifying causes were the pressure of superincumbent rocks, heat, the infiltration of a calcareous, ferruginous, or silicious cement, &c. (Lyell: Princip. of Geol., &c., ch. xii.)

2. Law:

(1) The combining of two or more actions in one.

"Application may be made on the part of the defendants in these several actions for a judge's order to stay all the actions except one. This is called consolidating the actions, and the order by which it is effected, the Consolidation Rule."—Arnold.

con'-sor-tism, s. [Eng. consort; -ism.]

Biol.: Physiological partnership, or vital association, between organisms of different kinds; symbiosis. It is loosely employed in the sense of mutualism or commensalism (q.v.), and more strictly to denote such intimate relationship as exists according to some authorities in the fungoid and algoid elements in Lichens, or between the unicellular algae formerly known as "yellow cells," and the majority of the Radiolarians. It has been said that the colour of the fresh-water Sponges and of the green Hydras is due to the presence of symbiotic algae; but this view is strongly combated by Prof. E. Ray Lankester, who asserts that it is really due to chlorophyll bodies, which have been found also in higher organisms, as in some Worms. Some green Protozoa, e.g., Stentor polymorphus, Coleps viridis, and Ophrydium viride, have also colourless forms, and this has given rise to doubt whether the colour in the green forms is due to chlorophyll bodies or to the presence of symbiotic green algae.

* con'-sort-ship, s. [Eng. consort; -ship.]

The condition or position of a consort; fellowship, partnership, companionship.

"Thus, committing wisely with the state of times, and the child's disposition and abilities of containing, must the parent either keep his virgin, or labour for the provision of a most consortship."—Bp. Hall: Cases of Conscience, IV. 1.

* côn-sta-bil'-i-tý, s. [Eng. constab(e); -ity.] The office of a constable.
* His constableness ceases immediately after the ceremony is over.—Misson: Travels in Eng., p. 123. (Davies.)

côn-sta-ble, côn-es-ta-ble, s. [Dan. constabel; Sw. konstapel; Dut. konstabel; Fr. connetable; O. Fr. & Prov. conestable; Sp. condestable; Port. condestavel; Ital. conestabile; Low Lat. conestabulus, from Lat. comes stabuli = (lit.) count of the stable.] [I. 1, (1).]
I. Formerly:
1. On the Continent:
(1) In the Roman empire during the latter part of its existence: The comes stabuli, the functionary from which the mediæval constable developed, had (as his name imported) charge of the stables with the horses housed therein. He was not a plebeian groom, but a high functionary, who might now be called Master of the Horse. The English word constable has not, as far as we know, been applied to him in this rudimentary stage of his development.

(2) In France and some other continental countries during mediæval times: Under the early French kings the comes stabuli, now transformed into the "constable," was a high functionary of government. He was commander-in-chief of the army, which then depended for success a good deal upon horsemen; was judge of military offences, and regulated all matters of chivalry. Such was the position of the first celebrated, and then notorious military leader, known to the French as the Constable, and in English history as the Constable, de Bourbon, who fell in his daring attack on the city of Rome on May 5, 1527. In 1627, the office, which his possession of it had rendered immortal in history, was abolished. Napoleon I. revived it, but it was finally brought to an end on the restoration of the Bourbon dynasty.

. . . had, since the eleventh century, given to France a long and splendid possession of Constables and Marshals.—Jacobs: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.
2. In England: The office of the constable crossed the Channel with the Norman conquerors, the dignitary who filled it being called Lord High Constable. The functions were the same as those of his French brother. As chief judge of the Court of Chivalry he encroached on the jurisdiction of other legal functionaries, and his power in this direction had to be abridged, which it was by the statute 13 Richard II., c. 2. The office of the High Constable, though carrying with it what may be called the Commander-in-Chiefship of the army, was hereditary, being attached to certain manors. It was therefore held successively by the Bohuns, Earls of Hereford and Essex, with their heirs, the Staffords, and the Dukes of Buckingham. In 1514, Henry VIII. discharged the manors of the burden of furnishing hereditary commanders to the army as an indirect means of dismissing the commanders themselves. When, in 1522, the then existing Duke of Buckingham was attainted for high treason, the manors themselves were confiscated to the Crown.

II. Now: The constables of English common law was early introduced in the American colonies, and now exists throughout the United States, though the office has lost many of its former functions in the cities, where it is in great part replaced by the police. In boroughs, townships, &c. the constable still constitutes the executive officer of the law, he having the power in some states, to pursue and arrest any criminal or breaker of the public peace, while everywhere it is his function to execute the orders of the magistrate. In England, constables are of two kinds, high and petty constables. The function of the latter is to preserve the peace.
* This attempt to revive the license of the Attle Stage was soon brought to a close by the appearance of a strong body of constables who carried off the actors to prison.—Macaulay's Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

¶ Special constables are respectable citizens sworn in to aid the regular police force to keep order on occasions of special danger. [CHARTIST.]

III. A large glass, the contents of which one is obliged to drink, if in company he did not drink fair; that is, did not drink as much as the rest of the company. (Scotch.)
¶ To outrun the constable, to overrun the constable: To spend more than one can afford; to live beyond one's means.

* côn-stâb-lër-ý, côn-sta'-blër-ýe, côn-sta-bil-rie, s. [O. Ital. conestabolaria.] [CONSTABLE.]
1. The office, position, or duties of a guardian or constable.
* Ye will take the constablarie of myn household and of all the lordship of my londe after me.—Martin, I, II, 373.
2. The body collectively of constables.
3. The jurisdiction or district of a constable.
* In this parish are seven constablarie and townships.—Burton: Monast. Ebor., 1758, p. 484.

* côn-sta-ble-shíp, s. [Eng. constable; -ship.] The office or position of a constable.
* This keepership is annexed to the constablarship of the castle, and that granted out in lease.—Carver: Survey of Cornwall.

* côn-sta-ble-ss, côn-sta-ble-sses, s. [Eng. constable(ss); -ess.] A female guardian or governor.
* Dame Hermgeld, constableness of that place.—Chaucer: Man of Law's Tale, 4, 933.

* côn-sta-ble-wick, s. [Eng. constable; -wick (q. v.).] The district under the jurisdiction of a constable, or over which his authority extends.
* If directed to the constable of D. he is not bound to execute the warrant out of the precincts of his constablarwick.—Bale: Hist. Pl. of the Cr., ch. I.

côn-stâb-u-lâr-ý, a. & s. [Low Lat. conestabularius; from conestabulus = constable (q. v.).]
A. As adj.: Pertaining to or consisting of constables; relating to the office of a constable.
B. As subst.: The body of constables in any town, district, or country.

* côn-stâb-u-lâr-ý, s. [Low Lat. conestabularius.] A constabulary; the jurisdiction or district of a constable.

* côn-stance, s. [Fr., from Lat. constantia.] Constancy.
* And telle hire constance, and hire besinesse.—Chaucer: The Clerk's Tale, 3, 884.

côn-stan-çý, s. [Lat. constantia; Sp. & Port. constancia; Ital. costanza, from Lat. constans = constant (q. v.).]
1. The quality of being constant; immutability, unalterable continuance, stability, fixedness.
* The laws of God himself no man will ever deny to be of a different constitution from the former, in respect of the one's constancy, and the mutability of the other.—Hooker.

* 2. An unvaried and unchanging state; consistency.
* Consistency of character is what is chiefly valued and sought for by naturalists.—Darwin: Descent of Man (1871), pt. I, ch. vii., vol. I, p. 214.

† 3. Resolution, firmness of mind, steady determination; a fixedness of purpose, perseverance.
* . . . compared you to those Greeks and Romans, whose constancy in suffering pain, and whose resolution in pursuit of a generous end, you would rather imitate than boast of.—Pope: Letter to Blount (1717).

4. Fidelity, faithful attachment.
5. Endurance of affection; permanence of love or friendship.
* While Innocence without disguise, And Innocence sincere.—The Doctor.

6. Consistency, steadiness, stability.
* . . . integrity, constancy, or any of the virtues of the noble family of Truth.—Macaulay's Hist. Eng., ch. II.
* 7. Certainty, reality.
* But all the story of the night told over, More witnesseth than fancy's image, And grows to something of great constancy.—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. I.

8. Frequency.
¶ Crabb thus discriminates between constancy, stability, firmness, and steadiness: "Constancy respects the affections; stability the opinions; steadiness the action or the motives of action; firmness the purpose or resolution. Constancy prevents from changing, and furnishes the mind with resources against weariness or disgust of the same object; it preserves and supports an attachment under every change of circumstances; stability prevents from varying, it bears up the mind against the movements of levity or curiosity, which a diversity of objects might produce; steadiness prevents from deviating; it enables the mind to bear up against the influence of humour, which temperance or outward circumstances might produce; it fixes on one course and keeps to it; firmness prevents from yielding; it gives the mind strength against all the attacks to which it may be exposed; it makes a resistance, and comes off triumphant." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

oôn-stant, a. & s. [Fr. constant; Ital. costante; from Lat. constans, pr. par. of consto = to stand firm: con = cum = with, together, and sto = to stand.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. Lit.: Remaining or continuing firm or fixed; not fluid.

"If you take highly rectified spirit of wine, and dephlegmated spirit of urine, and mix them, you may turn these two fluid liquors into a constant body."—Bogile: History of Firmness.

2. Figuratively:

* (1) Unvaried or unvarying, unchanging, durable.

"The world's a scene of changes, and to be Constant, in nature were inconsistency."—Cooley.

* (2) Firm, steady, or determined in mind; unshaken or unmoved in purpose or opinion; persevering.

"The lord priory seal found the woman, in her examination, constant in her former sayings."—Lord Herbert of Cherbury: Hist. Henry VIII., p. 472.

(3) Unchanging, continuous, unceasing.

"Onward its course the present keeps, Onward the constant current sweeps."
Longfellow: Coplas de Manrique (Translation).

(4) Firm and steadfast in affection; not fickle or changeable.

"... they yet remained constant friends"—Sidney.

* (5) Grave, important.

"I am no more mad than you are: make the trial of it in any constant question."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iv. 2.

† (6) Certain, sure, firmly attached or adhering. (Followed by to.)

"He shewed his firm adherence to religion, as mediated by our national constitution; and was constant to its offices in devotion, both in publick and in his family."—Addison: Freeholder.

* (7) Evident, acknowledged, obvious, beyond doubt or question. (Lat. constat.)

"It is constant, without any dispute, that if they had fallen on these provinces in the beginning of this month, Charleroy, Neville, Louvain, &c., would have cost them neither time nor danger."—Sir W. Temple: Works, II. 35.

(8) Frequent, continual.

II. Math. & Physics: Unvarying or unchanging. (See the compounds.)

B. As substantive:

Math. & Physics: That which is not subject to change, that which remains invariable.

¶ (1) Arbitrary or indeterminate constant:

Math.: A constant to which any value may be assigned at pleasure. Thus in the algebraic equation  $ax + 4 = 1 - my$ ,  $n$  and  $m$ , the coefficients of  $x$  and  $y$  respectively, may have any arbitrary value assigned them that one chooses.

(2) Constant of aberration, of friction, &c.:

Physics, Astron., &c.: A constant by the determination of which the aberration, friction, or anything varying within equally narrow limits may at any moment be determined.

(3) Determinate constant:

Math.: One which cannot be so altered; one which remains invariable, as the ratio between the radius and the circumference of a circle.

(4) Indeterminate constant: [Arbitrary constant.]

(5) Variation of constants:

Math.: This strange expression, which seems a contradiction in terms, means that what is theoretically a constant, and would be so if no other force operated, is made variable by the action of such a force. If, for instance, the orbit of a planet were a constant, a perturbation of its course in that orbit might and would be effected by a planet being in its vicinity as it passed a certain point; the constant would then for a time become a variant.

¶ For the difference between constant and continual, see CONTINUAL; for that between constant and durable, see DURABLE.

constant battery, s.

Elect.: An electric battery with two liquids. It is called constant because its action remains unimpaired for a considerable time. Daniell's Grove's, Bunsen's, and other batteries are of this type.

constant currents, s. pl.

Elect.: Currents of electricity produced by such batteries. They do not soon lose their force.

constant forces, s. pl.

Physics: Such as remain invariable or unchanging.

constant quantities, s. pl.

Math.: Such as remain invariable or unchanging while others increase or decrease.

constant white, s.

Pigments: Sulphate of baryta. When well prepared and free from acid, it is one of the best whites for water-colour painting, being of superior body in water, though not in oil. It is called also permanent white and barytic white. (Weale.)

oôn-stân-tia (tia as sha), s. [So named from the farms of Constantia at the Cape.] A kind of wine imported from the Cape of Good Hope, renowned as the best liquor wine after Tokay. The vines were originally brought from Shiraz, in Persia. (Ogilvie, &c.)

"The famous Constantia wine is the product of two contiguous farms of that name at the base of the Table Mountain, between eight and nine miles from Cape Town."—McCulloch: Dict. Commerce.

Côn-stân-ti-nô-pôl-tan, a. [Lat. Constantinopolitanus = belonging to Constantinople, so called after the Roman Emperor Constantine, who changed the original name of the city, Byzantium, to Constantinople = the city of Constantine; Gr. σταῖα (polia) = a city.] Of or pertaining to Constantinople or its inhabitants.

oôn-stant-ly, adv. [Eng. constant; -ly.]

* 1. With firmness, constancy, steadiness, or perseverance.

"And last of all he was called before the bishops in a common assembly at London, where he so constantly defended himself. . . ."—Frith: Works; Life, p. 3.

* 2. Patiently, firmly.

"Does our nephew bear his restraint so constancy, as you Deliver it?"

3. Continually, frequently.

"... was constantly desolated by bands of Scottish marauders."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. III.

oôn-stât, s. [Lat. = it is evident or acknowledged; 3rd pers. sing. pr. indic. of consto = (1) to stand firm, (2) to be established or certain.]

1. Literally:

Law:

(1) A certificate gives out of the Court of Exchequer to a person who wishes to plead or move for a discharge of anything in that court. It is so called because the effect of it is to make appear upon the record what respects the matter in question.

(2) The name given to an exemplification under the Great Seal of the enrolment of any letter patent. (Crabb.)

* 2. Fig.: A certificate, an assurance; sure evidence.

"We have a constat for his British nativity."—Fuller: Worthies, III. 493.

oôn-stêl-lâ-te, v. i. & t. [Lat. con, and stellatus, pr. par. of stella = to cover or set with stars; stella = a star.]

A. Intrans.: To join in lustre; to shine with combined radiance or splendour.

"The several things which engage our affection do, in a transcendent manner, shine forth and constellate in God."—Bogile.

B. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To set or adorn with stars.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To unite in one combined radiance or splendour, as stars.

"He who is sollicitous for his own improvement must . . . select from every tribe of mortals their characteristic virtues, and constellate in himself these scattered graces. . . ."—Amblar, No. 20.

(2) To ennoble, to illumine, to enlighten.

"... those that constellate, if I may so speak, an heroic mind."—Bogile: Works, vol. V, p. 551.

(3) To doom, to fate.

"I am at the best but a porter constellated to carry up and down the world a vile carcass."—W. de Britaine. Humane Prudence (1856), p. 91.

* oôn-stêl-lâ-têd, pa. par. or a. [CONSTELLATE, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

1. Clustered like stars.

2. Starlike, star-shaped.

"The constellated flower [daisy] that never sets."
Shelley: The Question.

3. Doomed, fated.

côn-stêl-lâ-tion, * oôn-stêl-lâ-çion, * con-stel-la-tion, s. [Ger. konstellation; Fr. constellation; Sp. constelacion; Port. constellaçã; Ital. constellazione, all from Lat. constellatio (genit. constellationis): con = cum = with, together, and stella = a star.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the astronomical sense. (II. 1, 2.)

2. Figuratively:

* (1) A planet or star; fortune.

"To be bore, other bygets in such constellatoun."
Langland: P. Plowman.

* (2) Fate, destiny.

"It is constellation, which causeth all that a man doeth."
Gower, i. 21.

(3) Illuminations or fireworks.

"... they now, in honor of the victorious champion of their faith, lighted up the canal of Amsterdam with showers of splendid constellations."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

(4) An assemblage of splendours or excellences.

II. Astronomy:

* 1. Originally: The relative positions of the several planets at a given moment.

2. Now: A number of fixed stars, grouped, for more easy identification, within the limits of an imaginary figure, supposed to be traced upon the vault of heaven. Eighty-three constellations are recognised by modern astronomers. The ancients had forty-eight, of which forty-seven are still accepted, the remaining one, Antinous, being now included in Aquila. Hevelius, of Dantzic, a distinguished astronomer, who flourished in the seventeenth century, intercalated nine others; and finally Lacaille, who prosecuted astronomical researches in the southern hemisphere, from 1751 to 1755, under the auspices of the French Government, found it needful to add twenty-seven more, mostly in regions of the sky which the ancients never beheld. The eighty-three recognised constellations may be grouped as follows:—

(1) The twenty ancient northern constellations:

1. Andromeda, Eng. name, Andromède; 2. Aquila, the Eagle; 3. Auriiga, the Charioter; 4. Bootes, Bootes; 5. Cassiopea, Cassiopea; 6. Cepheus, Cepheus; 7. Corona borealis, the Northern Crown; 8. Cygnus, the Swan; 9. Delphinus, the Dolphin; 10. Draco, the Dragon; 11. Equuleus, Equuleus; 12. Hercules, Hercules; 13. Lyra, the Lyre; 14. Ophiuchus or Serpentarius, the Serpent-bearer; 15. Pegasus, the Flying Horse; 16. Perseus, Perseus; 17. Sagitta, the Arrow; 18. Triangulum, the Triangle; 19. Ursa Major, the Great Bear; 20. Ursa Minor, the Little Bear.

(2) The twelve ancient zodiacal constellations:

1. Aries, the Ram; 2. Taurus, the Bull; 3. Gemini, the Twins; 4. Cancer, the Crab; 5. Leo, the Lion; 6. Virgo, the Virgin; 7. Libra, the Balance; 8. Scorpio, the Scorpion; 9. Sagittarius, the Archer; 10. Capricornus, the Goat; 11. Aquarius, the Water-bearer; 12. Pisces, the Fishes.

(3) The fifteen ancient southern constellations:

1. Ara, the Altar; 2. Argo Navis, the ship Argo; 3. Canis Major, the Great Dog; 4. Canis Minor, the Little Dog; 5. Centaurus, the Centaur; 6. Cetus, the Whale; 7. Corona Australis, the Southern Crown; 8. Corvus, the Crow; 9. Crater, the Cup; 10. Eridanus, Eridanus; 11. Hydra, the Hydra; 12. Lepus, the Hare; 13. Lupus, the Wolf; 14. Orion, Orion; 15. Piscis Australis, the Southern Fish.

(4) The nine introduced by Hevelius:

1. Camelopardus, the Giraffe; 2. Cæus Veneticus, the Hunting Ogo; 3. Coma Berenice, Berenice's Hair; 4. Lacerta, the Lizard; 5. Leo Minor, the Lesser Lion; 6. Lynx, the Lynx; 7. Monoceros, the Unicorn; 8. Sextans, the Sextant; 9. Vulpecula, the Fox.

(5) Lacaille's twenty-seven southern constellations as revised:

1. Antlia Pneumatica (abbreviated into Antlia, the Air-pump); 2. Apparatus, sci. Officinis, Sculptoris (Sculp-

Crux, or Crux australis, the Southern Cross; 9. Dorado, the Sword-fish; 10. Equuleus Pictorius (Pictori), the Painter's Easel; 11. Fornax, the Furnace; 12. Grus, the Crane; 13. Horologium, the Clock; 14. Hydra, the Water Snake; 15. India, the Indian; 16. Microscopium, the Microscope; 17. Mons Mensae (Mensa), the Table Mountain; 18. Musca, the Bee; 19. Norma, the Rule; 20. Octans, the Octant; 21. Pavo, the Peacock; 22. Phoenix, the Phoenix; 23. Picta Volans (Volans), the Flying Fish; 24. Retiolum, the Net; 25. Telescopium, the Telescope; 26. Tonantem, the Tonantem; 27. Triangulum Australe, the Southern Triangle.

[See all these words in their several places.] The several stars are designated by Greek letters, as a Lyra, γ Persei. The more important have also distinctive names, as Arcturus = a Bootis; Aldebaran = a Tauri; Betelgeuse = γ Orionis.

* con-stru-, v.t. & i. [CONSTRU.]

- 1. Trans. : To construe, to explain.
- 2. Intrans. : To conjecture.

"Construe what is, and tel not;
For I am fast sworn, I may not."
Wigt: A Riddle of a Gift given by a Ladle.

* con-ster-ie, * con-stry, * con-stree, s. [CONSTRU.]

"They sette ordinarie at St. Androu, in the Old Colledge church, [the place where the constru did sit formerly]."—Lamont's Diary, p. 55.

* con-stēr-nā-te, v.t. [Lat. constrernatus, pa. par. of constrerno = to terrify, to affright, from Fr. constrerner.] To strike with consternation.

"The king of Astopia and the Palatine were strangely constrernated at this association."—The Pagan Prince, 1890. (Nares.)

* con-stēr-nā-tion, s. [Fr. consternation; Sp. consternación; Port. consternação; Ital. consternazione, from Lat. consternatio (genit. consternationis) = consternation; constrerno = to strew over, to bestrew; con = together, and sterno = . . . to strew.] Such a combination of surprise, wonder, and terror as to literally or figuratively prostrate the individual thus affected.

In silence wrapp'd . . . the chiefs around,
Attend the stern reply.
Pope: Bomber's Hiss, bk. ix., l. 556-8.

* con-stillē, v.t. [Pref. con, and Eng. still (q.v.).] To distill, to drop.

"Som droppe of thi grace adowne to me constillē."
Lydgate: Minor Poems, p. 62.

* con-stī-pā-te, v.t. [In Fr. constiper; Ital. costipare; Sp. constipar; from Lat. constipō = to press or crowd closely together; con = together, and stipō = to press, to crowd.]

- I. Ordinary Language :
- * 1. To crowd together into a narrow passage; to thicken, to condense.

"There might arise some vertiginous motions or whirlpools in the matter of the chaos, whereby the atoms might be thrust and crowded to the middle of those whirlpools, and there constipate one another into great solid globes."—Bentley.

- 2. In the same sense as II. (q.v.).

II. Medicine :

* I. Gen. : To obstruct by filling up capillary or other passages.

"It is not probable that any ailment should have the quality of entirely constipating or shutting up the capillary vessels."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments.

2. Spec. : To render cestive, to bind. [CONSTITUTION.]

"Omitting honey, which is laxative, and the powder of some loadstones in this, doth rather constipate and bind than purge and loosen the belly."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

* con-stī-pā-tēd, pa. pa. & a. [CONSTITIPATE.]

* con-stī-pā-tīng, pr. par. & a. [CONSTITIPATE.]

* con-stī-pā-tion, s. [Fr. constipation; Prov. constipacio; Sp. constipación; Port. constipação; Ital. constipazione, all from Lat. constipatio = a crowding together.] [CONSTITIPATE.]

I. Ordinary Language :

* 1. The act of crowding anything into smaller space; the state of being so crowded; condensation.

"This worketh by the detention of the spirits, and constipation of the tangible parts."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

2. In the same sense as II. (q.v.).

II. Med. : An undue retention of the feces or their imperfect evacuation. When the morbid affection is but slight it is of little moment. In most cases, however, there is headache, more rarely vertigo; while if the disease be protracted and severe, colic, hemorrhoids, cutaneous eruptions, hysteria, epilepsy, or even ileus or enteritis, the last two fatal diseases, may be the result. In many cases constipation is from a torpid condition of the liver, or less of tone in the muscular coat of the alimentary canal, which in some cases is moreover distended by flatus. In many cases it is produced by the eating of an undue quantity of food, or of food that is indigestible. It is continually present in those who lead a sedentary life. Purgatives may temporarily remove a confined state of the bowels, but without abundant exercise in the open air no permanent cure can be expected.

* con-stir, v.t. [CONSTER, CONSTRU.]

* con-stir-rere, s. [CONSTRUER.]
". . . a constirrerre: expolitor, expoltrix, constructor, constructrix."—Catull. Anglium.

* con-stī-tue, v.t. [Fr. constituer.] [CONSTITUTE, v.] To constitute or appoint.

"Their being an gift and disposition of the said chaplains—to the provost, bailies, counsaill and comitie of Glasgw, makand constituandis thame patronis of the saynyll, . . ."—Acts, Ja. VI, 1584 (ed. 1814), p. 78.

* con-stī-tū-ēn-ēy, s. [Eng. constituent(s); -cy.] A body of voters who have the privilege of electing members of parliament. There are borough, county, and university constituencies. [REPRESENTATION.] Also used generally of any body of supporters.

* con-stī-tū-ent, a. & e. [Fr. constituant; Sp. constituente; Port. constituente, all from Lat. constituens (genit. constituents), pr. par. of constituo = to set or put together; con = together, and statuo = to cause to stand, to set up.]

A. As adj. : Constituting, making, composing, elemental. Used—
(1) Of things material.
"It is impossible that the figures and sizes of its constituent particles should be so justly adapted as to touch one another in every point."—Bentley: Serm.
". . . the constituent atoms of a compound. . ."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), viii., p. 213.

(2) Of persons individually or collectively.
"For the constituent bodies were generally delighted with the bill . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

† Constituent Assembly of France:
Hist. : The same as National Assembly (q.v.).

B. As substantive :

† I. A being, person, or thing which constitutes, forms, or produces anything.

"Their first composure and origination requires a higher and nobler constituent than chance."—Hale: Origin of Manhood.

2. That of which anything is made up. Used—

(1) When atoms of matters or aggregations of anything merely physical constitute the body.
"Mr. Sorby finds plates of mica to be also a constituent of slate-rock."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), xiv. 418.

"We know how to bring these constituents together, and to cause them to form water."—Ibid., i. 9.

(2) When persons constitute the body.
(a) Sing. : One who appoints an agent.
(b) Pl. (Spec.) : Parliamentary electors.

" . . . to appeal from the representatives to the constituents . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxv.

* con-stī-tū-te, v.t. [Lat. constitutus, pa. par. of constituo = to cause to stand together, to establish; con = cum = with, together, and statuo = to place, to settle; Fr. constituer; Sp. constituir; Ital. costituire.]

1. To establish, enact, or appoint; to found, to settle.
"We must obey laws appointed and constituted by lawful authority, not against the law of God."—Taylor: Holy Living.

* 2. To set up, to establish, to give existence to, to found.
"This Brutus had three sonnes, who constituted three kingdoms."—Shew: Memorabilia Antiquitatis.

3. To make up or compose; to give existence, form, or character to.
"The different forms of bones, when united according to various mechanical contrivances, constitute the skeleton."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. vi., p. 124.

4. To appoint, establish, or depute to an office.
"Me didst Thou constitute a priest of thine."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

5. A term generally used in Scotland to denote the opening of an ecclesiastical court with prayer by him who presides in it. It is said to be constituted with prayer by the Moderator.

† Crabb thus discriminates between to constitute, to appoint, and to depute: "The act of choosing some person or persons for an office, is comprehended under all these terms; constitute is a more solemn act than appoint, and thus than depute: to constitute is the act of a body; to appoint and depute, either of a body or an individual: a community constitutes any one their leader; a monarch appoints his ministers; an assembly deputes some of its members. To constitute implies the act of making as well as choosing; the office as well as the person is new; in appointing, the person but not the office is new. A person may be constituted arbiter or judge as circumstances may require; a successor is appointed, but not constituted. Whoever is constituted is invested with supreme authority derived from the highest sources of human power, common consent; whoever is appointed derives his authority from the authority of others, and has, consequently, but limited power; no individual can appoint another with authority equal to his own; whoever is deputed has private and not public authority; his office is partial, often confined to the particular transaction of an individual, or a body of individuals." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

† For the difference between to constitute and to form, see FORM.

* con-stī-tū-te, s. [Lat. constitutio, neut. pa. par. of constituo = to establish.] [CONSTITUTE, v.] That which is established or appointed; an established law.

"A man that will not obey the king's constitution."
Preston: Frag. of Oracles (about 1561).

* con-stī-tū-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONSTITUTE, v.]

A. As pa. par. : In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adjective :

- 1. Appointed, established, enacted.
- 2. Composed, made up.
- 3. Naturally framed.

* con-stī-tū-tēr, * con-stī-tū-tour, t. [Eng. constitut(e); -er.] One who or that which constitutes, appoints, or establishes.

* con-stī-tū-tīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONSTITUTE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj. : (See the verb.)

C. As substantive :

- 1. The act of appointing, establishing, or composing.
- 2. The act or process of forming or framing; composition.

* con-stī-tū-tion, * con-sty-tū-cy-one, * con-stī-tū-d-on, a. [Fr. constitution; Sp. constitución; Ital. costituzione, from Lat. constitutio, from constituo, pa. par. of constituo = to establish, to constitute.]

I. Ordinary Language :

- 1. The act or process of constituting, making up, or forming.
- "*Constitutio*ne Constitutio."—Prompt. Parv.

2. The act of constituting, establishing, or enacting; enactment, establishment.

3. An established form of government; a system of law and customs. [II. 1.]

4. Any particular law, rule, or regulation; an established custom; an institution or usage. [II. 2.]

5. The manner or nature of composing or making up a compound; the principles according to which compounds are made.

"Throughout this discourse the main stress has been laid on chemical constitution."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), ix. 220.

6. The state or nature of being; the particular texture of the component parts; the natural qualities of any compound material body.

" . . . the physical constitution of the sun."—Herschel: Astronomy (5th ed., 1858), § 285.

* 7. A corporeal frame.

"Amongst many bad effects of this oily constitution, there is one advantage; such who arrive to age are not subject to stricture of thren."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments.

8. The temper or disposition of the body in relation to health or disease; natural strength of the body.

" . . . a young man in constitution, in appearance, and in manner."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

9. A disposition or temper of mind; mental qualities.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pit, sire, sir, marine; gō, pēt, or, vōre, wōlf, wōrk, wōrk, sōn; mūte, cūh, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. sē, cē = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

"He cannot limit himself to the contemplation of it alone, but endeavours to ascertain its position in a series to which the constitution of his mind assures him it must belong."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), xiii. 377.

II. Technically:

1. Political Economy, Government, &c.: In this sense the word Constitution is popularly used with great vagueness. In the United States it indicates a written body of laws adopted by a convention, and constituting a fundamental instrument to which all legislation must conform. The United States as a whole, and each State as a unit, have constitutions of this character, which can be changed only in the manner of their adoption, and amended only under certain stringent regulations. The Constitution of the British Kingdom, on the contrary, is unwritten, and is in a state of constant change, it being essentially formed by the body of parliamentary law, and the rules and methods of governmental procedure which have grown up through centuries, and the fundamental postulates of which are as stable as those of the Constitution of the United States.

In this country such an instrument was made necessary by the weakness of the bond between the states formed by the Articles of Confederation, an instrument originated during the Revolutionary struggle, and which in a few years after its close proved so ill suited to hold the separate units of the country together, that it became evident that either a stronger tie of union must be made or the States would fall asunder. These "Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union" may be looked upon as the first Constitution of the United States. The Convention which formed the existing Constitution met on May 14, 1787, and was made up of the wisest and ablest of the statesmen which the country then possessed, and some of whom have never been surpassed for political wisdom and sagacity. It continued in session until the autumn of that year, and produced an instrument which has ever since been the admiration of legislators, and which Mr. Gladstone describes as the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man, yet which was, in many of its leading provisions, the result of a compromise between conflicting opinions, and when first promulgated satisfied no state and few persons. The instrument has strengthened with its age, and has served the nation admirably through more than a century of its existence, with the aid of a few amendments adopted to meet new conditions, or to supply omissions in the original instrument. Of the government formed by it the Supreme Court, which constitutes the Judiciary Department, is the greatest innovation. This great court stands alone in the governmental devices of nations, and has proved of the highest utility as a controlling power over the legislative department, which it prevents from setting aside in any sense the principles of the Constitution.

The several States have closely followed the general government in adopting a written constitution for each, with the same device of adjustment in a series of State Supreme Courts. These state constitutions have been modified and replaced from time to time, as the old instruments proved imperfect, the great State of New York, for instance, having within the last few years perfected the formation of a new constitution.

Other meanings have been given to the word Constitution. In the uprisings of the people of Continental Europe in 1848 constitutions were demanded, the instrument sought being a solemn compact between the people and their despotic rulers, which would have the effect to take from the Sovereign some of the power which he had usurped, and return it to its original source, the hands of the people.

"If this [the freedom and independency of parliament] be shaken, our constitution suffers. If it be quite removed, our constitution falls into ruin. That noble fabric, the pride of Britain, the envy of her neighbours, raised by the labour of so many centuries, repaired at the expense of so many millions, and cemented by such a profusion of blood; that noble fabric, I say, which was able to resist the united efforts of so many races of giants, may be demolished by a race of pigmies!"—Bolingbroke: Dissertation upon Parties.

2. Ecclesiology:

Apostolic Constitutions: Ordinances for the discipline of the Church, particularly the apostolical constitutions and a collection of regulations attributed to the Apostles, and supposed to have been collected by St. Clement, whose name they bear. Their authenticity has been greatly questioned.

"Constitution, properly speaking in the sense of the civil law, is that law which is made and ordained by some king or emperor; yet the canonists, by adding the word sacred to it, make it to signify the same as an ecclesiastical canon."—Aylife: Parergon Juris Canonici.

3. Scots Law:

Decree of Constitution: A decree by which the extent of a debt or obligation is ascertained. The term is generally applied to those decrees which are requisite to found a title in the person of the creditor in the event of the death of the debtor or the original creditor. (Ogilvie).

¶ Constitutions of Clarendon:

Ch. & Civil Hist.: Constitutions, in the sense of laws or regulations, made at a Council held at Clarendon, near Salisbury, on January 25, 1164. They were designed to define the boundary-line between civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and did so in a sense favourable to the civil power. On this account Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, refused to sign them, and excommunicated many of the ecclesiastics who had done so. This led to the feud between him and the civil government which ultimately caused his assassination, on December 29, 1170.

¶ For the difference between constitution and government, see GOVERNMENT.

con-stitū-tion-al, a. & s. [Fr. constitutionnel, from constitution.]

A. As adjective:

1. Pertaining or relating to a constitution or established form of government.

"... the perilous constitutional crisis which seemed inevitable at the close of last week."—Times, Nov. 13, 1874.

2. Founded on or consistent with an established form of government; legal, according to law.

"A nation which held so strictly to legal and constitutional precedent, in the administration of public affairs."—Lewis: Ored. Early Roman Hist. (1855), ch. iii., § 7, vol. I., p. 53.

3. Inbred in the constitution; radical, innate, natural; affecting the constitution.

"It is not probable that any constitutional illness will be communicated with the small-pox by inoculation."—Sharp: Surgery.

4. Beneficial to or done for the sake of the constitution.

B. As subst.: A walk or other exercise taken for the benefit of bodily health. (Colloquial).

con-stitū-tion-al-ism, s. [Eng. constitutionalism; -ism.] The theory or principles on which a constitution is based.

"The aim of this form of government is to keep a middle path, so as to annihilate despotism and slavery on the one hand, and, on the other, to arrest the development of democratic ideas. Such is evidently the principle of constitutionalism."—S. Edwards: Polish Congresses, ii. 80.

con-stitū-tion-al-ist, s. [Eng. constitutionalist; -ist.]

1. Ord. Lang. (Gen.): Any one who defends the constitution of his country, or is said by the political party to which he belongs to do so.

2. Eng. Hist. (Spec.): A name assumed by the Conservatives, with a few Whigs, in August, 1867. It never took root as a distinct party name, and, after being employed for two or three years, gradually died away.

† con-stitū-tion-al-iz-ty, s. [Fr. constitutionnalité.]

1. The quality or state of being constitutional or consistent with an established form of government; legality.

"In place of that you have got into your idle pedantries, constitutionalities, bottomless cavillings and questionings about written laws for my coming here."—Carlyle.

2. The quality or state of being constitutional or inherent in the body naturally.

† con-stitū-tion-al-ize, v. i. [Eng. constitutionalize; -ize.] To take a constitutional, or a walk for the benefit of the health.

con-stitū-tion-al-ly, adv. [Eng. constitutionally; -ly.]

1. In accordance or consistently with an established form of government; legally.

"... nothing would induce them to acknowledge that an assembly of lords and gentlemen, who had come together without authority from the Great Seal, was constitutionally a Parliament."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

2. In accordance with the constitution or natural disposition of the body; naturally.

"He was a man of quick and vigorous parts, but constitutionally prone to insolence."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

* con-stitū-tion-ist, s. [Eng. constitutionalist; -ist.]

1. Ord. Lang. (Gen.): One who adheres to or supports the constitution; a constitutionalist.

"Nothing can be more reasonable than to admit the nominal division of Constitutionists and Anti-constitutionists."—Bolingbroke: On Parties, L. 13.

2. Ch. Hist. (Spec.): A name given to those who accepted the decision of Pope Clement XI., as indicated in the Bull Unigenitus, that 101 propositions in the Commentary of Quesnel were heretical. They were called also Acceptants. They consisted of the Jesuits and their allies; the Jansenists were on the other side, and were called Appellants and Recusants.

con-stitū-tive, a. [As if from a Lat. constitutivus, from constitutus, pa. par. of constitui; Ital. & Sp. constitutivo.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Having the power or quality of constituting, framing, or producing anything; elemental, productive, composing.

"... neither naturally constitutive nor merely destructive."—Brown: Vulgar Errors.

2. Having the power to enact, constitute, or establish.

II. Logic, &c.: Predicating that something a priori determines how something else must or is to be; the opposite of regulative (q.v.).

* con-stitū-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. constitutively; -ly.] In a constitutive manner.

† con-stitū-tōr, a. [Lat.] One who or that which constitutes or composes; a constituent.

"... eloquence is only an assistant, but not a constituent, of eloquence."—Goldsmith: The Bee, No. vii.; On Eloquence.

con-strain', *oon-streign, *constrainen, *constreynen, *constreynyn, v. t. [O.Fr. constraindre, from Lat. constringo = to bind together, to fetter: con = cum = with, together, and stringo = to draw tight; Fr. contraindre; Ital. constringere, constringere; Sp. constrair; Port. constringir.]

* I. Literally:

1. To bring into a narrow compass, to compress, to shrink.

"Sumtyme sche constreynede and schrok his selven lykce to the comune measure of men."—Chaucer: Boethius, p. 8.

2. To restrain, hinder, or keep down by force.

"My sire in caves constrains the wiuds."—Dryden.

3. To bind, to tie.

"With their rich belts their captive arms constrains."—Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. xxi. l. 36.

4. To confine, to press, to clasp, to hold tightly.

"And with sweet kisses in her arms constrains."—Dryden.

5. To imprison, to shut up, to confine.

"Constrained him in a bird, and made him fly."—With party-colour'd plumage, a chattering rye.—Dryden.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. To bind, to constringe.

"When winter frosts constrain the field with cold."—Dryden: Virgil; Georgic ii. 430.

2. To restrain, to withhold, to keep back or down.

"... overweak to resist the first inclination of evil; or after, when it became habitual, to constrain it."—Bateley.

3. To force, to compel; to urge with irresistible power.

"Constreynyn. Compello, cogo, coarceo, arto, urgo."—Prompt. Parv.

"... without a strong sense of duty had constrained to take a step of awful importance."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

* 4. To necessitate, to compel.

"When to his lust Egyptus gave the rein, Did fate or we th' adult'rous act constrain!"—Pope: Homer; Odyssey l. 66.

* 5. To urge on.

"... the spirit within me constrains me."—Job xxxii. 18.

* 6. To ravish, to force, to violate, to do violence to.

* 7. To produce in opposition to nature.

"... constrained blenishes."—Shakep.: Ant. & Cleop., iii. 13.

cōn-strāin-a-ble, a. [O. Fr. constraignable; Fr. constraignable.] Capable of being constrained; liable to constraint. (Hooker.)

cōn-strained, pa. par. or a. [CONSTRAIN.]
A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.
B. As adjective:
1. Reduced by force or compulsion.
2. Forced, compelled; acting under compulsion and not voluntarily.
3. Done under compulsion; not voluntary, forced.

† cōn-strain-ēd-ly, adv. [Eng. constrained; -ly.] By compulsion or constraint; forcibly, compulsorily.
"... we did constrainedly those things, for which conscience was pretended."—Hooker.

cōn-strain-ēr, * cōn-streyn-er, s. [Eng. constrain; -er.] One who constrains, forces, or applies compulsion to anything; a ruler.
"To the maystirs of werks and to the constrayners of the people."—Wycliffe: Exod. v. 6.

cōn-strain-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONSTRRAIN.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).
C. As subst.: The act of compelling or forcing; constraint.

* cōn-strain-īng-ly, * cōn-streign-yng-ll, adv. [Eng. constraining; -ly.] In a constraining or compulsory manner; by compulsion or constraint.
"Fureynge not constraignynll but wilfalli."—Wycliffe: 1 Pet. v. 2.

cōn-strāint, * cōn-streint, * cōn-streynite, s. [O. Fr. constraint, pa. par. of constraindre.]

* 1. The act of constraining, compelling, or forcing; the exercise of compulsion or force.
"... the age and inclination of the person is to be considered, and constraint always to be avoided..."—Locke: Of Education, § 292.
2. Confinement, restraint.
"Through long imprisonment and hard constraint."—Spenser: F. Q. i. 2. 2.

3. Compulsion, force; a compelling force or power; necessity.
"Aud, serving God herself through mere constraint."—Cooper: Conversation.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between constraint and restraint: "Constraint respects the movements of the body only; restraint those of the mind, and the outward actions: when they both refer to the outward actions, we say a person's behaviour is constrained; his feelings are restrained: he is constrained to act or not to act, or to act in a certain manner; he is restrained from acting at all, if not from feeling: the conduct is constrained by certain prescribed rules, by discipline and order; it is restrained by particular motives: whoever learns a mechanical exercise is constrained to move his body in a certain direction; the fear of detection often restrains persons from the commission of vice more than any sense of their enormity. The behaviour of children must be more constrained in the presence of their superiors than when they are by themselves: the angry passions should at all times be restrained."

* cōn-strāint-ive, a. [Eng. constraint; -ive.] Having the power or quality of constraining; compelling, compulsory.
"... Not through any constraining necessity, or constraining vow..."—Carew: Surv. of Cornwall.

* cōn-strewe, v.t. [CONSTRUE.]
"That the concloncloun constrewe us eotho."—Depos. of Richard II., p. 29.

cōn-strict, v.t. [From Lat. contractus, pa. par. of constringo.] [CONSTRINGE.]
Physiol., &c.: To render narrower without the application of external pressure.
"... they are always arranged as membranous organs enclosing a cavity which their contraction serves to constrict."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. vii, p. 150.

cōn-strict-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONSTRIC.]

cōn-strict-tīng, pr. par. & a. [CONSTRIC.]
constricting snakes, s. pl.
Zool.: One of the three great divisions of Snakes or Serpents, the others being the Colubrine and the Viperine Snakes. The Boas and Pythons belong to this section of the Ophidians.

cōn-strict-ion, s. [Fr. contraction; Prov. contractio; Sp. contracción; Port. contração; Ital. costrizione, all from Lat. contractio (genit. contractiōis) = a binding or drawing together; contractus, pa. par. of constringo.] [CONSTRINGE.]
Anat. & Physiol.: A binding together; compression, contraction, astriction.

¶ Constriction binds by means of the physiological operation of the vessel acted upon; compression is produced by external force. Thus, the constriction of part of the throat may take place by the reduction through quinsy of the width of the aperture; while a wounded artery is compressed by a bandage tied around it.

cōn-strict-ive, * cōn-strict-ive, a. [Lat. contractivus.] Binding, contracting, astricting.
cōn-strict-tōr, s. [Mod. Lat. & Eng., from Lat. contractus = compressed, contracted, pa. par. of constringo = to bind together.] [CONSTRINGE.]
Ord. Lang.: The second word in the term Boa Constrictor, which was originally the Latin scientific name of a great American serpent. Now, however, the public have quite learned the term, and extended it to the Asiatic Pythons, or, indeed, to any large snake. [BOA CONSTRICTOR.] The term constrictor implies that the Boa so designated compresses, contracts, or even crushes any unfortunate animal or human being which it has succeeded in encircling within its deadly folds.

2. Anat.: Any muscle which compresses or contracts a tube, vessel, or organ in the body. Thus the pharyngeal wall is invested by an inferior, a middle, and a superior constrictor. There are also a constrictor isthmi faucium and a constrictor urethrae. (Quain.)

* cōn-stringe, v.t. [Lat. constringo = to bind tightly; con = cum = with, together, and stringo = to draw tight.]
1. To bind tightly; to contract, to draw together.
"The dreadful spot,
Which shalmen do the hurricano call,
Constring'd in mass by the almighty sun."
Shaksp.: Troil. and Cress. v. 2.

2. To contract, to cause to shrink.
"Strong liquors, especially inflammatory spirits, in toxicole, constringe, harden the fibres, and conglute the fluids."—Arbuthnot.

cōn-stringed, pa. par. [CONSTRINGE.]

cōn-strin-gēnt, a. [Fr. constringent, from Lat. constringens, pr. par. of constringo.] [CONSTRINGE.] Having the quality of binding or contracting.

cōn-strin-gīng, pr. par. & a. [CONSTRINGE.]

cōn-strūct, v.t. [Lat. constructus, pa. par. of construo = to put together, to construct; con = cum = with, together, and struo = to heap, to pile; strues = a heap; Fr. construire; Sp. & Port. construir; Ital. costruire.]
I. Literally:
1. To build up, to frame, to form; to put together the component parts of a material structure.
"... he was pleased to construct this vast fabric."
—Boyle: Usefulness of Natural Philosophy.

2. To put together; to arrange.
"... all celestial objects be ascertained, and maps and globes constructed."—Herschel: Astronomy (5th ed., 1833), § 296.

II. Fig.: To form or fabricate by the mind; to make up.
"The thought occurred to him that he might construct a story..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. xxii.

cōn-strūc-tēd, pa. par. or a. [CONSTRUCT.]

cōn-strūc-tēr, s. [Eng. construct; -er.] One who constructs, frames, or puts together.

cōn-strūc-tīng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONSTRUCT.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).
C. As subst.: The act of putting together, framing, or arranging; construction.

cōn-strūc-tion, * cōn-struc-ti-on, * cōn-struc-cy-on, s. [Fr. construction; Lat. constructio = a putting together, a building, from constructus, pa. par. of construo.]
A. Ordinary Language:
I. Literally:
1. The act of constructing, building, framing, or putting together; erection.
"The Normans of this period... were very imperfectly acquainted with the principles of construction."—Parker: Gothic Arch., pt. 1, ch. iii, p. 43.
2. The form or manner of building; a structure, conformation.
"The ways were made of several layers of flat stones and flint: the construction was a little various..."—Arbuthnot.

II. Figuratively:
1. The act or process of forming or fabricating in the mind.
2. The manner in which anything is constructed or arranged by the mind.
* 3. Judgment or mental representation.
"I cannot, therefore, vnto reasonable constructions seem strange..."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.
* 4. The act of construing, interpreting, or explaining by a proper arrangement of terms.
"John Cornwall, a master of grammar, changed the lore in grammar schole and constructions of French into Englishe."—Trevila, ii. 161.
5. The act of mentally interpreting or putting a meaning on.
"For this play at this time, is only in The merciful construction of good women."
Shaksp.: Hen. VIII., epilogue.

6. A sense or meaning attributed to words or actions; an explanation or interpretation.
"Under your hard construction must I sit."
Shaksp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 1.

B. Technically:
1. Gram.: The syntactical arrangement and connection of the words in a sentence.
"Some particles constantly, and others in certain constructions, have the sense of a whole sentence contained in them."—Locke.
2. Geom.: The act or manner of constructing a figure by the drawing of such lines as may be necessary for the demonstration of any problem; also the additional figure so drawn.

¶ Sometimes the expression that a problem is solved by construction means no more than that it is solved by geometric instead of algebraic methods.
3. Mathematics:
Construction of an equation:
(1) The drawing of such lines and figures as will represent geometrically the quantities in the equation and their relations to each other.
(2) A term sometimes used when the roots of an equation are given, and it is required that the solution shall be found from these. This is the exact opposite of the process usually adopted in dealing with equations.
4. Naut.: The method or process of ascertaining a ship's way by means of trigonometrical problems and diagrams. (Ogilvie.)
5. Legal & Parliamentary: The interpretation of the words of an act, a will, a deed, or anything similar.
"In the construction, for the purposes of this Act, of the Acts hereinafter incorporated, the expression 'The Special Act' shall mean the Public Health Act, 1848."—Local Government Act, 1863, vii.

¶ (1) Court of Construction:
Law: The Court of Chancery, now the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice. When the Probate Court or Division decides that an instrument is a will, that of Chancery can, in certain circumstances, decide that for specified reasons it is invalid.
(2) To bear a construction: To allow of a certain explanation or interpretation.

late, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; try, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

... facts which had been proved would bear two constructions. —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xli. (3) To put a construction on or upon: To interpret or explain in a certain way.

* cōn-strūc-tion-āl, a. [Eng. construction; -āl.] Pertaining to or deduced from construction or interpretation; constructive.

* cōn-strūc-tion-īst, s. [Eng. construction; -īst.] One who puts a construction upon the law, legal documents, &c. Generally limited by an adjective; as strict, severe, broad, &c.

* cōn-strūc-tive, a. [Fr. constructif.]

1. Having ability or power to construct or form.

"The constructive fingers of Watt, Fulton, Arkwright."—Emerson: Essays, Series 1, No. 1, p. 36.

2. Relating to construction or forming; as, Constructive accounts.

3. Derived from or depending on construction or interpretation; not directly expressed.

"It was not possible to make it look even like a constructive treason."—Burnet: Hist. of his Own Time (1829).

¶ (1) Constructive notice:

Law: Evidence of facts which render it highly probable that notice must have been given.

(2) Constructive total loss:

Marine Insurance: The assumption that the total loss of the ship or goods insured is so certain, if it has not occurred already, that the insurer is willing to take the amount of the insurance and relinquish all right to the property insured, even if, after all, it should happen to be recovered uninjured.

(3) Constructive treason:

Law: An attempt to prove by forced or unnatural construction of statutes that certain offenses are treason, though the law does not plainly call them so. Under arbitrary rulers this was a weapon used with dangerous effect against liberty.

(4) Constructive trust:

Law: A trust which may be assumed to exist, though no actual mention of it be made.

(5) Constructive uses:

Law: Implied, as distinguished from express or resulting, use in the transfer of property. [Use, s.]

* cōn-strūc-tive-lŷ, adv. [Eng. constructive; -lŷ.] By construction; by inference or deduction.

* cōn-strūc-tive-ness, s. [Eng. constructive; -ness.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A tendency to form or construct.

2. Phrenol.: A faculty apposed to give the power of or skill in construction; constructive ability.

* cōn-strūc-tōr, s. [CONSTRUCTOR.]

* cōn-strūc-tūre, s. [Pref. con, and Eng. structure (q.v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: An edifice or fabric; the whole structure or mass.

"They shall the earth's constructure closely bind, And to the centre keep the parts confind."—Blackmore.

2. Scots Law: A mode of industrial accession whereby, if a house be repaired with the materials of another, the materials accrue to the owner of the house, full reparation, however, being due to the owner of the materials. (Opilvie.)

* cōn-strūc, * con-strore, * con-struyn, v.t. & i. [Lat. construo = (1) to heap together, to build, (2) to construe: con = cum = with, together, and struo = to heap; strues = a heap; Fr. construire.] [CONSTRUCT, CONSTRER.]

A. Transitive:

1. To apply the rules of syntax to; to arrange words in their natural order, so as to show the exact meaning.

"Clerks that were confessours, couple hem togeders To construe this clause."—P. Plowman, p. 71.

2. To translate, to reduce from one language to another.

"Lete thy confessor syre kyng, construe this in English."—P. Plowman, p. 71.

3. To interpret, to explain; to put a construction upon.

"... the Courts were enjoined to construe this Act largely and beneficially for the suppressing of dissent and for the encouraging of informers."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xl.

B. Intrans.: To apply the rules of syntax to; to explain grammatically.

"In alle the gramere scoles of Egelond children lerneth Freusche and construeth and lerneth an Englishe."—Trivisia, ff. 141.

* cōn-strūed, pa. par. or a. [CONSTRUE.]

* cōn-strū-ēr, * con-stru-are, s. [Eng. construe(e); -er.] One who construes.

"Construare. Constructor."—Prompt. Pars.

* cōn-strū-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONSTRUE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of applying the rules of syntax to; interpreting or explaining grammatically.

* con-stult, v.t. [Pref. con, and Lat. stultus = foolish.] To be or become as great a fool as another.

* cōn-sū-prāte, v.t. [Lat. constupratus, pa. par. of constupro: con = cum = with, together, and stupro = to ravish.] To violate, to ravish, to debauch.

* cōn-sū-prā-téd, pa. par. or a. [CONSTUPRATE.]

* cōn-sū-prā-tion, s. [Lat. constupratus.] The act of violating or debauching; violation, defilement.

* cōn-sū-ā-lŷ-a, s. pl. [Lat., from Consus = a name of Neptune. According to Festus he was the god of counsel.]

Roman Archæol.: Games in honour of Consus [see etym.], celebrated by the Romans on the twelfth day of the kalends of September, i.e., on the 13th of August. These were the games at which the Romans carried off the Sabine women who had come as spectators; indeed, it is said that it was to facilitate the perpetration of this lawless act of rapine that Romulus resolved to observe the games. They were afterwards called Circenses, from being celebrated in the circus.

* cōn-sū-jēct, v.t. [Pref. con, and Eng. subject, v. (q.v.).] To make subject in conjunction with others.

"They would consubject themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin."—Raleigh: Hist. World, bk. ii, ch. xix, § 6.

* cōn-sū-sist', v.t. [Lat. con = together, and subsisto = to stand still, to remain standing; sub = under, and sisto = to cause to stand.] To subsist or exist together.

* cōn-sū-sis-tīng, pr. par. & a. [CONSUBSIST.]

* cōn-sū-stān-tial (ti as sh), * con-sub-stān-tiall, a. [Fr. consubstantiel; Sp. & Port. consustancial; Ital. consustanziale; Lat. consubstantialis: con = cum = with, together, and substantialis = pertaining to the same essence or substance, substantial, from substantia = that of which a thing consists; the being, essence, or substance of any thing or of any being.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Of the same nature.

"Or as in spring-time from one sappy twig, There sprouts another consubstantial aprig."—Du Bartas: The sixth Day of the First Week.

2. Theol., Logic, &c.: Having the same substance or essence, coessential.

¶ When the Arian controversy ran high in the Church, and with the view of settling it Constantine was induced to summon the General Council of Nice in 325, the Council pronounced in favour of the Athanasian view that the Second Person of the Trinity is homoousios (homoousios) with the Father. [Homoousios.] To this the corresponding Latin term was consubstantialis. The Greek and Roman Churches, as well as those of England and Scotland with the leading Continental Protestant Churches, still adopt this view; thus the second of the Thirty-nine Articles commences, "The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God and of one substance with the Father . . ." Similarly the Westminster Confession of Faith—the standard of the proper Presbyterian Churches—teaches that "In the unity of the Godhead there be three persons of one substance . . ." (ch. ii, § 3).

"The Lord our God is but one God; in which indivisible unity, notwithstanding we adore the Father, as being altogether of himself, we glory that consubstantial Word, which is the Son . . ."—Hooker.

† cōn-sū-stān-tial-ism (ti as sh), s. [Eng. consubstantial; -ism.]

Theol.: The same as CONSUBSTANTIATION (q.v.).

* cōn-sū-stān-tial-īst (ti as sh), s. [Eng. consubstantial; -ist.]

Theol.: One who holds the doctrine of consubstantiation.

* cōn-sū-stān-ti-āl-lŷ-tŷ (ti as sh), s. [Fr. consubstantialité; Sp. consustancialidad; Port. consustancialidade.] [CONSUBSTANTIAL] Co-existence in the same substance; participation in the same nature. (Used chiefly in connection with the doctrine of the Trinity.)

"I replied, 'Neither is the Consubstantiality, the Homöism of Nicæa, to be found in the scriptures, but in the Holy Fathers, . . .'"—Newman: Development of Christian Doctrine, ch. v, § 8.

* cōn-sū-stān-tial-lŷ (ti as sh), adv. [Eng. consubstantial; -lŷ.] In a consubstantial manner, so as to possess identity of substance or nature.

* cōn-sū-stān-ti-āte (ti as sh), v.t. & i. [CONSUBSTANTIATE, a.]

A. Trans.: To cause to unite in one common substance or nature.

"That so by 'putting his finger into the print of the nail and thrusting his hand into his side,' he (St. Thomas) might almost consubstantiate and unite himself unto his Saviour, . . ."—Hammond: Works, iv, 654.

B. Intransitive:

1. To unite in one common substance or nature.

2. To hold the doctrine of consubstantiation (q.v.).

* cōn-sū-stān-ti-āte (ti as sh), a. [Pref. con = cum = with, together, and Eng. substantiate (q.v.).] Of the same substance or nature with, participating in a common nature.

"We must love her, [the wife.] that is thus consubstantiate with us."—Feltham: Sermon on St. Luke, xiv 20.

* cōn-sū-stān-ti-ā-téd (ti as sh), pa. par. & a. [CONSUBSTANTIATE, v.]

* cōn-sū-stān-ti-ā-tīng (ti as sh), pr. par. & a. [CONSUBSTANTIATE, v.]

* cōn-sū-stān-ti-ā-tion (ti as sh), s. [Fr. consustantiation; Port. consustanciação, from Lat. con = together, and substantia = substance.] [CONSUBSTANTIATE.]

+1. Ord. Lang. & Logic: Union of two or more substances together.

2. Theology & Church History:

(2) Ch. Hist.: It is believed that the first to promulgate the doctrine of Consubstantiation was John, surnamed Pungens Aianus, a doctor of Paris, at the end of the thirteenth century. Luther either adopted or thought it out anew for himself, and it will for ever be identified with his name. It was adopted also by Melancthon and most of the other North German reformers, except Carlstadt, and became the creed of the Lutheran Church. It is taught in the tenth article of the Augsburg Confession, which asserts that the real body and blood of Christ are truly present in the Eucharist, under the elements of the bread and wine, and are distributed and received. Ulrich Zwingli, and subsequently Calvin, with most of the other Swiss and South German reformers, on the contrary, considered that the sacramental elements were merely symbolic of the body and blood of Christ, which were not corporeally present in the Eucharist. Bitterness of feeling arose between the combatants on the respective sides, and efforts to reconcile them failed. The doctrine of consubstantiation is still held as a fundamental tenet by the Lutheran Churches. It is sometimes called Impanation (q.v.).

Eccles.: A ritual of monastic forms and customs.

"An account of a consuetudinary of the abbey of St. Edmund's Bury."—Baker: MSS. Catalogue by Masters, Camb. p. 61.

cón-súl, s. [Lat. consul, in old inscriptions consol, and once cosol. Remote etym. doubtful, generally derived from consulo = to deliberate; but the sol of the old form consol has been considered to be the root sol of solum = a seat, the sol of sella = a seat, chair, or stool, and the sol of sedeo = to sit. In this case consul would be those who sit together.]

1. Roman History:

(1) Property (Pl., Comitia): Two supreme magistrates, with equal authority, elected annually in ancient Rome from the time of the expulsion of the kings and the commencement of the republic (A. C. 244; B. C. 509). They were called at first praetors (praetors), imperatores (commanders), and iudices (judges); but ultimately the name consules (consuls) prevailed over these designations. The annual meeting or assembly of the Roman citizens for their election was called by the plural term comitia, from the comitium, a place in or near the forum, where the elections were held. They continued, with a few exceptional elections, during the whole period of the republic, and were so important in the State, that the successive years were distinguished by the consuls who had held office during each of them. At first none but patricians could hold the dignity, but in B. C. 366 plebeian was elected one of the consuls, and in B. C. 172 two. The consulate nominally continued under the empire, but was little more than a titular dignity. Iberia transferred the power of electing consuls from the people to the senate. Afterwards their number was augmented. The last consul at Rome was Decimus Theodorus Paulinus in A. D. 536; the last at Constantinople, Basilus Junior in A. D. 541.

(2) A senator (of Venice).

"Many of the consuls raised and met Are at the duke's already."
Shakespeare: Othello, I. 2.

2. French Hist.: One of three supreme magistrates in France, designated first, second, and third consul, who held office between 1799 and 1804. Napoleon Bonaparte was the first consul, and his power soon absorbed that of the rest. [CONULATE, 2.]

3. Comm.: An officer appointed by the government of his country to reside in a specified foreign land, with the view of promoting the mercantile interests of the nation in whose service he is engaged. On arriving at his destination, or on his being appointed a consul—if he be a native of the land in which he is accredited, he shows his credentials to the government of the region in which he is to reside, and obtains an exequatur [EXEQUATUR] sanctioning his appointment, and according him all the rights and privileges enjoyed by his predecessors. He annually or more frequently reports to his government the state of commerce in the region where his opportunities of observation lie. The office of consul in this sense seems to have arisen in Italy about the middle of the twelfth century, and by the sixteenth had spread over Europe.

consul-general, s. A consul of higher official dignity than ordinary, who has jurisdiction over ordinary consuls or at more places than the one in which he ordinarily resides; a chief consul.

cón-súl-age, s. [Eng. consul; -age.]

Commerce:

1. A consulate or consulship.

"At Connell we debated the business of the consulation of Leghorn."—Breigh: Diary, Nov. 8, 1672. [Devoted.]

2. A duty or tax paid by merchants for the expense of protecting their goods by means of a consul in a foreign country.

cón-su-lar, a. [Sp. & Port. consular; Fr. consulaire; Ital. consolare, from Lat. consularis.]

1. Pertaining to a consul.

"... the men of consular dignity."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1855), ch. xii, pt. v., § 51, vol. II, p. 267.

2. Having been consul. [A CONSULAR MAN.]

¶ A consular man:

Roman Archaeol.: One who has been consul.
 "... Macrobius a consular man."—Bacon: Works (ed. 1765), vol. I, pref., p. 429.

consular tribunes, s. pl.

Roman Archaeol.: Military tribunes with the same power as consuls would have possessed. They were the highest officers of the State from A. U. C. 310 (B. C. 443) to A. U. C. 388 (A. C. 365). [TRIBUNE.]

cón-su-late, s. [Fr. consulat; Sp. & Port. consulado; Ital. consolato, all from Lat. consulatus = the consulship.]

1. Roman Archaeol.: The office of a consul, a consulship.

"Bearing the honorable offices of preture and consulate."—Holland: Suetonius, p. 180.

2. French Hist.: The office of a consul in the political sense. A consulate was established in France on November 10, 1799. On December 24 a first, second, and third consul were appointed, Napoleon Bonaparte being the first consul, whose term of office was extended on August 4, 1802, so as to be for life. But on May 18, 1804, the consulate gave way to the empire, the first consul being transformed into the emperor.

3. Commerces:

(1) The office of a commercial consul of England or any other country.

(2) The residence of a consul.

cón-súl-ship, s. [Eng. consul, and suff. -ship.] The office or dignity of a consul, especially in the original or Roman sense of that word.

"How many stand for consulships!"—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, II. 2.

cón-súl't, v. i. & t. [Fr. consulter, from Lat. consulto, a frequent form of consulo = to consult, to consider.]

A. Intrans.: To deliberate, to take counsel together.

"But the chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death."—John III. 10.

(1) Followed by with before the persons consulted.

"He sent for his bosom friends, with whom he most confidently consulted."—Clarendon.

(2) Followed by for before the persons for whose benefit the consultation is held.

"... three hundred and twenty men sat consulting always for the people."—Mac VIII. 15.

B. Transitive:

1. To ask advice or seek counsel from.

"The Lord President probably expected that he should be consulted before they were given away."—Murray: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

2. To refer to, to examine; as, to consult a book.

3. To have regard to, to act with a view to, to respect, to consider.

"Be just, consult my glory, and forbear."
Pope: Horace's Iiad, bk. xvi. l. 115.

* 4. To plan, to plot, to contrive, to devise.

"O my people, remember now what Balak king of Moab consulted."—Micah VI. 5.

* 5. To bring about by counsel or contrivance, to contrive.

"Thou hast consulted shame to thy house by cutting off many people."—Habakkuk, II. 10.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between consult and deliberate: "Consultations always require two persons at least; deliberations require many, or only a man's self: an individual may consult with one or many; assemblies commonly deliberate: advice and information are given and received in consultations; doubts, difficulties, and objections, are started and removed in deliberations. We communicate and hear when we consult; we pause and hesitate when we deliberate: those who have to co-operate must frequently consult together; those who have serious measures to decide upon must coolly deliberate." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cón-súl't, s. [Lat. consultum = a decree or decision, neut. sing. of consultus, pa. par. of consulto.]

1. The act of consulting or deliberating together, a consultation.

"After short silence then And summons read, the great consult began."
Milton: P. L., bk. I.

2. The result of consultation or deliberation; a decision or determination.

"... the council broke;
 And all their grave consults dissolved in smoke."
Dryden: Pitcolt.

3. A number of persons met for consultation or deliberation; a council.

"A consult of coquets below Was called, to rig him out a bean." Swift.

4. A person consulted.

"But, cried the consult, 'a happy prognostic!'—
Gentlemen instructed, p. 143. [Devotee.]

5. Agreement, concert.

"... march 't' oppose the faction in consult With dying Dorax."
Dryden: Don Sebastian, IV. 1.

cón-súl't-a-ble, a. [Eng. consult; -able.] Able or ready to be consulted.

"I have got my... collection stuck on tablets and put in consultable order."—E. Forbes: In Memoriam of Wilson and Gettice, ch. xii, p. 422 (July 18, 1847).

cón-súl't-ar-ý, a. [Low Lat. consultarius.] Formed on or resulting from consultation.

¶ Consultary response:

Law: The opinion of a court on a special case. (Wharton.)

cón-súl't-a-tion, a. [Fr., from Lat. consultatio.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of consulting or deliberating; deliberation.

"The subject of these consultations."—Murray: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

2. The act of referring to or examining; a reference to.

"By the consultation of books."—Rambler, No. 67.

* 3. A number of persons met to consult together; a council; a meeting of experts to consider a point or case.

"A consultation was called, wherein he advised a salvation."—Wiseman: Of Abscesses.

II. Law: (See extract.)

"Consultatio is a writ whereby a cause, being formerly removed by prohibition from the ecclesiastical court, or court Christian, to the king's court, is returned thither again; for the judges of the king's court, if, upon comparing the libel with the suggestion of the party, they do find the suggestion false, or not proved, and therefore the cause to be wrongfully called from the court Christian; then, upon this consultation or deliberation, decree it to be returned again."—Covey.

cón-súl't-at-ive, a. [Lat. consultatus, pa. par. of consulto; Eng. suff. -ive.] Pertaining to consultation or deliberation; having the power or right of consulting and giving advice or decisions. It is opposed to Executive (q. v.).

cón-súl't-éd, pa. par. or a. [CONSULT, v.]

cón-súl't-ér, s. [Eng. consult; -er.] One who consults or seeks advice or information.

¶ Followed by with before the person or thing consulted.

"There shall not be found among you a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard."—Deut. XVIII. 11.

cón-súl't-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CONSULT, v.]

A. As pr. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adjective:

1. Seeking advice or information.

2. Imparting, or capable of imparting, advice; as, a consulting barrister, a consulting physician.

"The death of Dr. Lake, F.R.S., hon. consulting surgeon to the hospital, was also noted."—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 25, 1851.

3. Pertaining to or used for consultations; as, a consulting room.

C. As subst.: The act of deliberating or consulting together; consultation.

cón-súl't-ive, a. [Eng. consult; -ive.] Determined by consultation, deliberate, consultative.

"He that remains in the grace of God, sins not by any deliberate, consultive, knowing act."—Sp. Taylor.

fate, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fáll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camél, hēr, thère; pme, pít, síre, sír, maríne; gō, pót, or, wōre, wól, wórk, whó, són; mūte, cúb, cūre, unte, cūr, rále, fúll; try, síryan. æ, œ = é; ey = ä. qu = kw.

cón-sult-ive-ly, adv. [Eng. consultive; -ly.] Of deliberate purpose, deliberately.

"...Therefore consultively I overstep it."—Nash: Lenten Stage.

cón-súm-a-ble, a. [Eng. consum(e); -able.] Capable of being consumed; susceptible of consumption or total destruction; fit for consumption.

cón-súme, v.t. & i. [O. Fr. consumer; Sp. consumir; Ital. consumare, from Lat. consumo = to take up wholly, to consume: con- = with, together, fully, and sumo = to take.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To destroy, as by decomposition, waste, or fire.

"And the fire of God came down from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty."—2 Kings i. 12.

2. To bring to utter ruin, to destroy, to exterminate.

"Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment."—Numb. xvi. 21.

II. Figuratively:

1. To use up, to absorb, to utilize.

"When, therefore, writers on the conservation of energy speak of tensions being 'consumed' and 'generated,' they do not mean thereby that old attractions have been annihilated."—Tyndal: Frags. of Science (3rd ed.), i. 28.

2. To devour, to eat up greedily.

"...only the stomachs lay idle and consumed all."—Camden: Remains; Wise Speeches.

3. To wear away, to waste, to cause to disappear.

"His flesh is consumed away."—Job xxxiii. 21.

*4. To spend, to pass.

"Thus in soft english she consumes the day."—Thomson: Spring.

5. To waste, to dissipate, to squander.

6. To wear away mentally.

"I bring consuming sorrow to thine age."—Shaksp.: Titus Andronic, iii. 1.

"Som man consumed with hate and envy enye."—Lydgate: Minor Poems, p. 159.

* B. Reflex.: To waste, to spend.

"... thou consumest thyself in single life?"—Shaksp.: Sonnet, ix. 2.

C. Intrans.: To waste away slowly, to wear away; to be exhausted, to disappear. (Generally followed by away.)

"Their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongue shall consume away in their mouth."—Ezek. xiv. 12.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to consume, to destroy, and to waste: "The idea of bringing that to nothing which has been something is common to all these terms. What is consumed is lost for any future purpose; what is destroyed is rendered unfit for any purpose whatever: consume may therefore be to destroy as the means to the end; things are often destroyed by being consumed: when food is consumed it serves the intended purpose; but when it is destroyed it serves no purpose, and is likewise unfit for any. When iron is consumed by rust, or the body by disease, or a house by the flames, the things in these cases are literally destroyed by consumption: on the other hand, when life or health is taken away, and when things are either worn or torn so as to be useless, they are destroyed. In the figurative signification it is synonymous with waste: the former implies a reducing to nothing; the latter conveys also the idea of misuse: to waste is to consume uselessly: much time is consumed in complaining, which might be employed in remedying the evils complained of; idlers waste their time because they do not properly estimate its value: those who consume their strength and their resources in fruitless endeavours to effect what is impracticable, are unfit for doing what might be beneficial to themselves." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cón-súmed', pa. par. or a. [CONSUME.]

* cón-súm'-éd-ly, adv. [Eng. consumed; -ly.] Or perhaps a corruption of consummately (q.v.) Very much, greatly, excessively.

"... they lunched consumedly."—Byron: Vision of Judgment, Preface.

* cón-súme'-less, a. [Eng. consume; -less.] Unconsumable, indestructible.

"How the purple waves Scald their consumeless bodies."—Quarles: Emblems, iii. 14. (Davies.)

cón-súm'-ér, s. [Eng. consum(e); -er.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who consumes, uses up, wastes, or destroys.

2. Polit. Econ.: One who uses, and in using destroys, the value of an article produced.

1. Ord. Lang.: To bring to completion; to perfect, to finish, to complete; to raise to the highest pitch or point.

"To consummate this business happily."—Shaksp.: King John, v. 2.

2. Law: To perfect, as a marriage, by subsequent cohabitation.

cón-súm'-mate, a. & adv. [Lat. consummatus, ps. par. of consummo = to finish, to complete: con- = with, together, wholly, and summus = the highest, the greatest.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Complete, perfect.

"... earth in her rich attire Consummated, lovely smiled..."—Milton: P. L., bk. vii.

2. Perfect, of the highest degree or quality.

(1) Of persons:

"Form'd by the eve of that consummate age, In early bloom, an oracle of age."—Pope: Homers's Odyssey, bk. iv. l. 233-4.

(2) Of things:

"... both the attack and the defence would be conducted with consummate ability."—Encyclop. Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

II. Law:

Consummate tenant by courtesy: A husband who, upon his wife's death, becomes entitled to hold her lands in fee simple or fee tail, of which she was seized during her marriage for his own life, provided he has had issue capable of inheriting. (Oldiv.)

B. As adverb: Consummately.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between consummate and complete: "As epithets, consummate is employed only in a bad sense, and complete either in a good or bad sense: those who are regarded as complete fools are not unfrequently consummate knaves: the theatre is not the only place for witnessing a farce; human life affords many of various descriptions; among the number of which we may reckon those as complete in their kind, which are acted at elections, where consummate folly and consummate hypocrisy are practised by turns (?)." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cón-súm-mā-téd, pa. par. & a. [CONSUMMATE, v.]

A. As pa. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Completed, perfected, finished.

II. Law: Perfected, as a marriage by cohabitation.

cón-súm-mā-tíng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONSUMMATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of perfecting or completing; consummation.

cón-súm-mā-tíon, s. [Fr. consummation; Lat. consummatio, from consummatus, pa. par. of consummo.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Lit.: The act of consummating, completing, or perfecting; the end or completion.

"... from its original to its consummation."—Advertiser, Spectator.

II. Figuratively:

1. The end of the present system of things; the end of the world.

2. Death; the end of life.

"Or if, by Thy decree, The consummation that will come by death Be yet far distant, let Thy Word prevail."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. ix.

3. A result, an end, an event.

"A happy consummation! an accord Sweet, perfect, to be wish'd for..."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.

B. Law:

Consummation of marriage: The completion or perfecting of conjugal relation by sexual intercourse.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between consummation and completion: "The arrival at a conclusion is comprehended in both these terms, but they differ principally in application; wishes are consummated; plans are completed: we often flatter ourselves that the completion of all our plans will be the consummation of all our wishes, and thus expose ourselves to grievous disappointments: the consummation of the nuptial ceremony is not always the consummation of hopes and joys; it is frequently the beginning of misery and disappointment: we often sacrifice much to the completion of a purpose which we afterwards find not worth the labour of attaining." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cón-súm-mā-tór, s. [CONSUMMATER.]

* cón-súm-mā-tór-ý, a. [Eng. consummator; -y.] That consummates, completes, or perfects; consummating.

* cón-súmp't (p silent), a. & s. [Lat. consumptus, ps. par. of consumo.]

A. As adj.: Consumed, destroyed, expended.

"It is not given to know how that ben dede and consumpt."—Chaucer: Boethius, p. 60.

B. As subst.: Consumption.

cón-súmp'-tíon, * cón-súmp'-oi-on (p silent), s. [Fr. consumption; Sp. consumicion; Ital. consumazione, from Lat. consumptio = a consuming; from consumptus, ps. par. of consumo.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act or process of consuming, destroying, or dissipating; destruction.

2. The state or process of being consumed, or of gradual waste and decay.

"I can get no remedy against this consumption of the purse..."—Shaksp.: 2 Hen. IV., l. 2.

3. The process of using up or utilising. [U. S.]

II. Technically:

1. Political Economy:

(1) The utilisation or expenditure of the products of industry.

(2) The amount or quantity of industrial products expended or utilised.

"Every new advance of the price to the consumer is a new incentive to him to retrench the quality of his consumption..."—Burke: On a Regicide Peace, Let. 2.

2. Medicine:

(1) Hist.: A disease called by the Greeks phthisis (phthisis) = a decline, a decay, a wasting away, from phthō (phthō) = to decay, to dwindle. The Romans retained the Greek word phthisis, though they had also a word of their own, consumptio: from the Latin came the English word Consumption. [Etyim.]

Phthisis in medicine became a genus, with the proper meaning of wasting away, and under it were reckoned various species, as Phthisis pulmonalis, P. hepatica, &c. Consumption also is a genus, with at least two species, one the Pulmonary and the other the Mesenteric form.

(2) Symptoms, &c.: Consumption is popularly supposed to be produced by a neglected cold, inflammation of the lungs, or the breaking of a blood-vessel. In most cases these are the effects of the disease, not its causes. Its remote origin is often hereditary tendency or constitutional proclivity. In the former case the skin in childhood has a pale pearly look, the upper lip is large, and the cheeks full. If the complexion be dark the colour is sallow; if fair, it is unnaturally white, with large conspicuous veins: those who are fair being sometimes very beautiful, those who are dark generally the reverse. The circulation in both cases is languid, and the strength as a rule small. There is generally mental precocity in the fair, whilst there are often dulness and stupidity in the dark. Sooner or later "tubercle" is deposited at the apex of one of the lungs, just beneath the shoulder-bone. [TUBERCLE.] The irritation which it causes produces a dry cough, soon followed by more or less difficulty of breathing. Expectoration next takes place when the cough comes, the matter ejected being, in the earliest stage, frothy-like saliva, then with specks of opaque matter, then wholly tenuous, and at times streaked with blood. The original tubercles are now breaking, but others are commencing, the disease travelling downwards till it pervades the whole lobe of the lung, after which a similar process tends to begin in the remaining lung. Long before this, however, the whole constitution has sympathized with the local injury. There are hectic fever, night perspirations, emaciation, and other symptoms, till the scene is closed by edema of the lower limbs, aphthae (small ulcers) in the mouth, mild delirium, and death. The mean duration of the disease from the first deposition of tubercle is twenty-three months, but in more than one-half the cases the fatal result takes place within nine months and often within four. There are various types of it, specially an acute, a chronic, and a latent type. It exists in all countries of the world, but not equally in all. Certain climatic conditions seem highly useful in the treatment of consumption, such as those of the mountains of Colorado, and of North Carolina, with other districts of the United States, the eastern section of the Cape of Good Hope, parts of India, Australia, and New Zealand and other localities. In many countries consumption causes one-fifth or more of all the deaths that occur. The mortality is greatest between the ages of twenty and forty.

That this disease is produced by bacilli is now widely held by medical men, and there has been considerable discussion as to whether or not it is contagious. Though this question has not been satisfactorily settled, definite measures of precaution against contagion are being taken in some of our cities. Tuberculous cows are being killed to prevent the communication of the disease by means of milk, and steps have been taken to prevent contagion by the dried sputum of patients, which has been found to be full of bacilli.

"Do thy affections consympathize!"—Timon (Old Play), ll. 1.

* cón-ta-bes'-gence, s. [From Lat. contabesco = to waste away gradually.]
Bot.: An abnormal condition of the stamens in which they are defective. (R. Brown, 1874.)

* cón-táb'-u-lá-téd, pa. par. or a. [CONTABULATE.]

* cón-táb'-u-lá-tion, s. [Lat. contabulatio, from contabulo.] The act or process of flooring with boards; a boarding, a flooring.

* con-tack, * con-tak, s. [CONTEK.]

* cón-táct, s. [Fr. contact; Sp. contacto; Ital. contatto, from Lat. contactus = a touching on all sides, pa. par. of coningo: con = cum = with, together, fully, and tango = to touch.]

I. Literally:

1. Touch, close union or junction of one body with another.

"The Platonists hold, that the spirit of the lover does pass into the spirits of the person loved, which causeth the desire of return into the body; whereupon followeth that appetite of contact and conjunction."—Bacon: Natural and Experimental History.

2. The act or power of touching.

"They [the basking sharks] will permit a boat to follow them, without accelerating their motion till it comes almost within contact."—Fennant: British Zoology; Basking Shark.

II. Figuratively:

1. Close union or connection.

"The history of astronomy has numerous points of contact with the general history of mankind."—Lewis: Astron. of Ancients (1822), ch. L, § 1, p. 2.

2. Society or communication in business; connection.
". . . and none of the many diplomatists with whom he has been brought into contact . . ."—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 15, 1881.

III. Special phrases and compounds:

1. Angle of contact:

Math.: The angle made by a curved line and the tangent to it at the point of contact.

2. Contact action:

Chem.: The same as CATALYSIS (q.v.).

3. Contact of the first order:

Math.: Contact of two curves in a point for which they have the same coefficient of the first order.

4. Contact of the second order:

Math.: Contact of two curves in a point for which they have the same differential coefficient of the first order, and the same differential coefficient of the second order. (Ogilvie.)

5. Point of contact:

Math.: The point in which two lines, planes, or bodies touch each other.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between contact and touch: "The former expresses a state, and referring to two bodies actually in that state: the latter on the other hand implying the abstract act of touching; we speak of things coming or being in contact, but not of the contact instead of the touch of a thing; the poison which comes from the poison-trees is so powerful in its nature, that it is not necessary to come in contact with it in order to feel its baneful influence; some insects are armed with stings so inconceivably sharp, that the smallest touch possible is sufficient to produce a puncture into the flesh." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* contact-level, s. An adaptation of the spirit level used by certain instrument-makers for the production of exact divisions of scales, and generally for the determination of minute differences of length. (Knight.)

† cón-tác'-ti-cal, a. [Eng. contact; -ical.] Pertaining to or implying contact; contactual.

* cón-tác'-tion, s. [Eng. contact; -ion, as if from a Lat. contactio, from contactus.] The act of touching; contact, touch, juncture.

* cón-tác'-tu-al, a. [Lat. contactus; Eng. ad. suff. -al.] Pertaining to or implying contact.

* cón-tá-gion, s. [Fr. contagion; Sp. contagio, contagion; Port. contagião, contagio; Ital. contagio, contagione, all from Lat. contagio = a touching, contact, touch; contingo = to touch, to lay hold of: con = together, and tango = to touch.]

1. Med. & Ord. Lang.:

(1) The communication of a disease by contact with the person labouring under it, as distinguished from infection, used to signify its transmission by means of the air without actual personal contact with the diseased person. But sometimes the word contagion is used in both of these senses, and is divided into immediate or contactual contagion, that produced by actual contact, and mediate or remote contagion, communicated by the air. Infection is used in a more extensive sense, to include also miasmata or other causes of diseases not coming from human beings, but rising from marshes or from any other source. Some make the two words contagion and infection strictly synonymous.

(2) The poisonous matter communicated by contact of some kind.

(3) Venom, poison.

"'Til touch my point with this contagion."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 7.

2. Ord. Lang. & Fig.:

(1) The communication by other people of anything deleterious to the mind or heart.

"Nor will the goodness of intention excuse the scandal and contagion of example."—King Charles.

(2) The deleterious influence exerted.

"There, in his commerce with the liveried herd, lurks the contagion chiefly to be feared."—Cowper: Zircinctum.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between contagion and infection: "Some things act more properly by contagion, others by infection. The more powerful diseases, as the plague or yellow fever, are communicated by contagion; they are therefore denominated contagious; the less virulent disorders, as fevers, consumptions, and the like, are termed infectious, as they are communicated by the less rapid process of infection: the air is contagious or infectious according to the same rule of distinction; when heavily overcharged with noxious vapours and deadly disease, it is justly entitled contagious, but in ordinary cases infectious. In the figurative sense, vice is for the same obvious reason termed contagious; and bad principles are denominated infectious; some young people, who are fortunate enough to shun the contagion of bad society, are, perhaps, caught by the infection of bad principles, acting as a slow poison on the moral constitution." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cón-tá-gioned, a. [Eng. contagion; -ed.] Affected by contagion.

* cón-tá-gion-ist, s. [Eng. contagion; -ist.]

Med. Hist.: One who holds the view that certain diseases, the evidence regarding the transmission of which from those affected to others is doubtful, are really contagious.

* cón-tá-gi-ous, * con-ta-geous, * con-ta-gy-ous, a. [Fr. contagieux; Sp., Port., and Ital. contagioso, all from Lat. contagiosus.]

I. Literally:

1. Med. (Of a disease): Communicable by contact. [CONTAGION.]

2. Of air, of flies, &c.: Communicating or transmitting contagion.

"After the which reign ensued so great a multitude of flies, the which were to the people so noxious and contagious, that they slew much people."—Fabjan, vol. 1, ch. xix.

II. Fig.: Communicating anything from one to another or to others.

fáte, fát, fáre, amidat, whát, fáll, father; wé, wét, hère, camel, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gó, pót, or, wóre, wólf, wórk, whé, són; müte, cüb, cüre, uníte, cür, rúle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = é. ey = ä. qu = kw.

¶ (1) Contagious Diseases Acts: Acts passed from 1865 to 1868 to prevent the spread of venereal disease in garrison towns. Though a Royal Commission and a Select Committee reported in favour of these Acts, public feeling against them was so strong that in 1863 they were repealed.

(2) Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts: Acts passed for the protection of horses, cattle, sheep, goats, and swine, from certain contagious diseases, and enforced by orders issued from time to time by the Privy Council, which also regulates the landing and slaughter of foreign cattle.

côn-tâ'-giôus-ly, adv. [Eng. contagious; -ly.] In a contagious manner, so as to communicate contagion or anything else capable of being transmitted from one to another.

"There is nothing which spreads more contagiously from teacher to pupil than elevation of sentiment." —J. S. MILL: Inaug. Address at St. Andrew's, 1807, p. 57.

côn-tâ'-giôus-ness, s. [Eng. contagious; -ness.] The quality of being contagious.

"Those corpuses, that impregnate the Egyptian air upon the swellings of the Nile, are able to put a speedy stop, not only to the contagiousness, but to the malignity of the plague. . . ." —Boyle: Works, vol. v., p. 66.

*côn-tâ'-gy-üm, s. [Lat.] The same as CONTAGION (q.v.).

"... no contagium of measles, nor any contagium of scarlet-fever, nor any contagium of small-pox. . . ." —Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), xl, 512.

*con-ta-gy, s. [Lat. contagium.] A contagious complaint.

"... and after followed a contagy and a fowle steneche." —Fabyan: Chron., pt. vii., ch. cxxviii., p. 242.

côn-tain', *con-tayne, *con-tene, *con-taini, *con-tenne, *con-tienon, *kun-tenne, *con-tenyn, v. & t. [Fr. contenir; Sp. contener; Ital. contenere, from Lat. continere = to contain; con = cum = with, together, and tenere = to hold.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To hold within fixed limits, as in a vessel. "Contenyn, haun or keppyn wit-inuy K. Kepe within F. Contineo." —Prompt. Para. "... heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee. . . ." —2 Chron. vi, 18.

2. To be capable of holding; to have capacity for.

II. Figuratively:

*1. To restrain, to hold or keep within bounds.

"... laws are afterwards to be made for keeping and containing it. . . ." —Spenser: Present State of Ireland.

2. To comprehend, to comprise, to include. "Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture. . . ." —1 Pet. ii, 6.

3. To be equivalent to, to comprehend. "A cubite of gemetrie conteyneth sixe comoun cubites." —Pereira, II, 228.

*4. To fill up, to amount to.

"Som epistel . . . that walde, se with myn sauctour wil contene neigh ball this boke." —Chaucer: Troilus, III, 482.

*5. To comprise, to make up a number, to include.

"Shrewes, which that contenneth the more partle of men." —Chaucer: Boethius, p. 116.

6. To include, to be accompanied or attended by.

"Byggunnyng of mans lyf . . . Contennes mykel wrechednes." —Havspole: Pricks of Conscience, 489.

B. Reflexive: 1. To restrain or retain oneself, to keep quiet or calm.

"Contain thyself, good friend." —Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, II, 2.

*2. To conduct, bear, or carry oneself.

"Hon hit soelde hem containt the wrole the bataille ilaste." —Rob. of Glouc., p. 647.

*C. Intransitive:

1. To restrain oneself, to keep quiet or calm. ". . . as he read, he wept and trembled; and not being able longer to contain. . . ." —Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. I.

2. Spec.: To live in continence or chastity.

"But if they cannot contain, let them marry. . . ." —1 Cor. vii, 2.

3. To conduct or bear oneself; to act.

"That kemell knight kunteyned on his stede." —William of Palerne, 3, 800.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to contain and to hold: "These terms agree in sense, but differ in application; the former is by comparison noble, the latter is ignoble in its use; hold is employed only for the material contents of hollow bodies; contain is employed for the moral or spiritual contents; in familiar discourse a cask is said to hold, but in more polished language it is said to contain a certain number of gallons. A coach holds or contains a given number of persons; a room holds a given quantity of furniture; a house or city contains its inhabitants." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ For the difference between to contain and to comprise, see COMPRISE.

côn-tain'-a-ble, a. [Eng. contain; -able.] Capable of being contained.

*côn-tain'-ant, s. [Fr. contenant, pr. par. of contenir.] One who or that which contains, a container.

côn-tained', pa. par. & a. [CONTAIN.]

côn-tain'-er, s. [Eng. contain; -er.] One who or that which contains.

"And you, fair eyes, containers of my bliss." —Daniel: Complaint of Rosamond.

côn-tain'-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CONTAIN.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

1. The act or state of holding, including, or comprehending.

*2. That which is contained; contents. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline, v, 5.)

*côn-tain'-ment, *con-tein-ment, s. [Eng. contain; -ment.]

1. Substance.

"Twenty pounds a month, a vast sum. . . enough to shelter the containment of a rich man's estate." —Fuller: Ch. Hist., IX, iv, 2. (Davies.)

2. Competence (?).

"Let us now see if there be not a good means of virtuous containment, as well in the days of peace as of warre." —Time's Storehouse. (Latham.)

*côn-tain't, s. [CONTENT, s.] Extent, size.

"... called a sea from the large containt thereof." —Fuller: Pious Sight, bk. III, ch. ix, p. 295.

côn-tain'-in-âte, v. t. [Lat. contaminatus, pa. par. of contaminare = to defile; contamin = contagion.] [CONTACT.] To defile, to sully, to pollute; to corrupt, to tarnish. (Generally used figuratively.)

"... shall we now contaminate our fingers with base bribes?" —Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iv, 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to contaminate, to pollute, to defile, and to taint: "Contaminate is not so strong an expression as defile or pollute; but it is stronger than taint; these terms are used in the sense of injuring purity; corrupt has the idea of destroying it. Whatever is impure contaminates, what is gross and vile in the natural sense defiles, and in the moral sense pollutes; what is contagious or infectious corrupts; and what is corrupted may taint other things. Improper conversation or reading contaminates the mind of youth; lewdness and obscenity defile the body and pollute the mind; loose company corrupts the morals; the coming in contact with a corrupted body is sufficient to give a taint." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*côn-tain'-in-âte, a. [Lat. contaminatus.] Contaminated, defiled, polluted.

"The sons of idiots, of ignoble birth, Contaminate, and viler than the earth." —Sandys: Paraphr. of Job, p. 42.

côn-tâm'-in-â-téd, pa. par. or a. [CONTAMINATE, v.]

côn-tâm'-in-â-tíng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONTAMINATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of polluting, defiling, or tarnishing.

côn-tâm'-in-â-tion, s. [Lat. contaminatio, from contaminatus.]

1. The act of contaminating, polluting, or defiling.

2. That which pollutes, defiles, or contaminates.

côn-tâm'-in-â-tive, a. [Eng. contaminat(e); -ive.] Having a tendency to contaminate or pollute.

côn-tân'-gô, s. (Etym. doubtful. Perhaps only a slang word; but cf. Sp. contante = ready money.)

Stock Exchange: The commission on "contingencies," i.e., for carrying over transactions from the settling day to the one which succeeds it—viz., the account day—when the money due is actually paid.

*con-tas, *con-tasse, s. [COUNTESS.]

*con-tec-our, s. [CONTEKER.]

*con-teek, s. & v. [CONTEK.]

*con-teck-our, s. [CONTEKER.]

*côn-téc'-tion, s. [Lat. contectus, pa. par. of contectus = to cover; con = cum = with, together, fully, and tego = to cover.] The act of covering; a cover. (Browne: Tracts.)

*con-tek, *con-tak, *con-teck, *con-tecke, *con-teke, s. [Norm. Fr. contek = a quarrel, resistance; contequier = to touch; the second element apparently corresponds to the second element in at-tach, at-tack.]

1. Quarrel, dissension, contention.

"A contak: ôst stryfe." —Cathol. Anglicum.

"Contek bigan bitene hom." —Rob. of Glouc., p. 809.

2. Disgrace, contumely.

"Thei toke this kynge seruauitie, and punishiden with contek, and killiden hem." —Wycliffe: Select Works, I, 49.

*con-tek, *con-teck, v. i. [CONTEK, s.] To quarrel, to dispute, to disagree.

*con-tek-er, *con-teck-our, *con-tek-our, *con-tec-our, s. [Mid. Eng. contek; -er, -our.] A quarrelsome person.

*côn-têm'-êr-âte, a. [Lat. contemneratus, pa. par. of contemnero = to defile; con = cum = with, together, fully; temero = to treat rashly, to defile.] Defiled, contaminated, polluted, violated.

côn-têm'-n (n silent), *con-temne, *con-temne, v. t. [O. Fr. contemner; Ital. contemnero, from Lat. contemno = to despise; con = cum = with, together, wholly; temno = to despise.]

1. To despise, to view with contempt or disdain; to scorn.

"She that asks Her dear five hundred friends contemns them all." —Cowper: The Task, bk. II.

2. To slight, to reject, to neglect.

"Because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsel of the most High. . . ." —Ps. cvii, 11.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to contemn, to despise, to disdain, and to scorn: "Contemn, as applied to persons, is not incompatible with a Christian temper when justly provoked by their character; but despising is distinctly forbidden and seldom warranted. Yet it is not so much our business to contemn others as to contemn that which is contemptible; and we are not equally at liberty to despise the person, or anything belonging to the person, of another. Whatever springs from the freewill of another may be a subject of contempt; but the casualties of fortune or the gifts of Providence, which are alike independent of personal merit, should never expose a person to be despised. We may, however, contemn a person for his impotent malice, or despise him for his meanness. Persons are not scorned or disdained, but they may be treated with scorn or disdain; they are both improper expressions of contempt or despise; scorn marks the sentiment of a little vain mind; disdain of a haughty and perverted mind. A beautiful woman looks with scorn on her whom she despises for the want of this natural gift. The wealthy man treats with disdain him whom he despises for his poverty." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* con-tem-nand-lie, adv. [North Eng. & Scotch contemmand, pr. par. of contemn; -ly.] Contemptuously, in contempt of a law or order.

con-témned (n silent), pa. par. or a. [CONTEMN.]

* con-témn-éd-ly (n silent), adv. [Eng. contemned; -ly.] In a despicable or contemptible manner; despicably.

"For if from high degree
Hee suddenly dole to live contemnedly
With the vile vulgar sort."

Sylvestre: Paradox against Liberty, 209.

con-témn-ér (n silent), * con-tempn-er, s. [Eng. contemn; -er.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who contemns or despises; a scorner.

2. Law: One who has committed contempt of court. (Wharton.)

con-témn-íng (n silent), pr. par., a., & s. [CONTEMN.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of despising or scorning; contempt.

"Security is the base of good success; it is no contempting of a foiled enemy . . ."—Sp. Hall: Cont. Arab & Benhadad.

† con-témn-íng-ly (n silent), adv. [Eng. contemning; -ly.] In a scornful manner; with contempt or scorn; contemptuously.

con-temp-ci-on, s. [CONTEMPTION.]

* con-tém-pér, v.t. [Lat. contempéro = to temper, to moderate.] To temper or moderate; to reduce to a lower degree by mixture; to allay, to soften.

"The leaves qualify and temper the heat, and hinder the evaporation of moisture."—Ray: On the Creation.

* con-tém-pér-a-mént, s. [Pref. con, and Eng. temperament (q.v.).] The quality or state of being tempered or moderated; temperament.

"There is nearly an equal contemperament of the warmth of our bodies to that of the hottest part of the atmosphere."—Derham.

* con-tém-pér-áte, v.t. [Lat. contemperatus, pa. par. of contempéro.] To temper, to moderate, to soften, to reduce.

"The mighty Nile and Niger do not only moisten and temperate the air, but refresh and humectate the earth."—Brownie: Vulgar Errors.

* con-tém-pér-á-tion, s. [Lat. contemperatus, pa. par. of contempéro.]

1. The act of moderating, softening, or reducing in degree by a mixture of something of an opposite nature or tendency.

"The use of air, without which there is no continuation in life, is not nutritious, but the contemperation of fervor in the heart."—Brownie: Vulgar Errors.

2. Adapting, regulating, or suiting.

" . . . the contemperation of affairs to the civil constitutions of cities and provinces. . . ."—Hammond: Works, vol. II, p. 59.

3. Relative or proportionate mixture; proportion.

"There is not greater variety in men's faces, and in the contemperations of their natural humors, than there is in their phantasies."—Bale: Origin of Man-kind.

* con-tém-pér-á-türe, s. [Pref. con, and Eng. temperature (q.v.).] Contemperament, relative or proportionate mixture.

" . . . the different contemperature of the elements."

—South, vol. ix, Ser. 8.

* con-tém-plant, a. [Fr., pr. par. of contempler.] Meditative, contemplative.

"Contemplant Spirit! ye that move o'er . . ."
Coveridge: Religious Musings. (Davies.)

con-tém-pläte, or con-tém-pläte, v.t. & i. [Lat. contemplatus, pa. par. of contemplor = to observe; first used of the augurs who attended the temples of the gods: con = cum = with, together, and templum = a temple, a space marked out for the observation of auguries; Fr. contempler.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To look at, to view, to observe.

"Fill, growing with its growth, we thus dilate Our spirits to the size of that they contemplate."
—Watts.
Byron: Child Harold, lv, 158.

II. Figuratively:

1. To look at or observe from various points of view; to study, to meditate or reflect deeply on.

"There is not much difficulty in confining the mind to contemplate what we have a great desire to know."
—Watts.

2. To have in view, to purpose, to intend, to design.

3. To look for, to expect.

B. Intransitive:

1. To meditate or reflect deeply, to study, to ponder.

(1) Followed by over before the subject meditated on.

"Sapor had an heaven of glass, which he trod upon, contemplating over the same as if he had been Jupiter."
—Peacham.

(2) Followed by on.

"How can I consider what belongs to myself, when I have been so long contemplating on you."—Dryden: Juvenal, Pref.

2. To look for, to expect, to purpose.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to contemplate, to meditate, and to muse: "We contemplate what is present or before our eyes; we meditate on what is past or absent. The heavens and all the works of the Creator are objects of contemplation; the ways of Providence are fit subjects for meditation. One muses on the events or circumstances which have been just passing. We may contemplate and meditate for the future, but never muse."

In this case the two former terms have the sense of contriving or purposing: what is contemplated to be done is thought of more indistinctly than when it is meditated to be done; many things are had in contemplation which are never seriously meditated upon: between contemplating and meditating there is often a greater distance than between meditating and executing. Meditating is a permanent and serious action; musings is partial and unimportant; meditation is a religious duty, it cannot be neglected without injury to a person's spiritual improvement; musings is a temporary employment of the mind on the ordinary concerns of life, as they happen to excite an interest for the time." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

con-tém-plä-téd, pa. par. or a. [CONTEMPLATE.]

* con-temp-la-tif, * con-temp-la-tife, a. [CONTEMPLATIVE.]

con-tém-plä-tíng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONTEMPLATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of meditating or reflecting; contemplation, meditation.

con-tém-plä-tion, * con-temp-plä-ci-on, * con-temp-plä-ci-oun, s. [Fr. contemplation; Sp. contemplacion; Ital. contemplazione, from Lat. contemplatio, from contemplatus, pa. par. of contemplor.] [CONTEMPLATIVE.]

I. Lit.: The act of looking at or viewing; a sight, a view.

II. Figuratively:

1. The act or process of contemplating or reflecting deeply; meditation, reflection, deep thought or study.

"Soared on some wild fantastic theme,
Of faithful love, or ceaseless Spring,
Till Contemplation's wearied wing
The enthusiast could no more sustain,
And sed he sunk to earth again."
—Scott: Roboby, l. 25.

*2. Suggestion, mediation, plan.

"The soldiers . . . at the contemplation of a certain India there amongst them, were licensed by the king to depart without armour or weapon."—Holinshed: Chron., vol. III, p. 370.

3. Holy meditation; the exercise of the soul or mind in meditating on sacred things.

"I have . . . breathed a secret vow To live in prayer and contemplation."
—Keats: Ser. of Venice, III. 4.

4. The results of meditation or study; reflections, thoughts.

5. The act of purposing, designing, or looking forward to anything.

6. The faculty of study.

"There are two faculties, contemplation, and practice, . . ."
—South.

¶ To have in contemplation: To have under consideration; to purpose, to design, to expect, to intend.

* con-tém-plät-ist, a. [Eng. contemplat(e); -ist.] One who contemplates or meditates; a contemplator.

B. As substantive:

Ch. Hist.: A religious, of either sex, devoted to contemplation and prayer.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between contemplative and musings: "Contemplative and musings, as epithets, have a strong analogy to each other. Contemplative is a habit of the mind; musings is a particular state of the mind. A person may have a contemplative turn, or be in a musings mood." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

con-tém-plä-tíve-ly, adv. [Eng. contemplative; -ly.] In a contemplative or thoughtful manner; with contemplation or meditation; attentively.

† con-tém-plä-tíve-néss, s. [Eng. contemplative; -ness.] The quality or condition of being contemplative; meditation, thoughtfulness.

con-tém-pör-rä-nö-ös, a. [Lat. contemporaneus, from con = cum = with, together, and tempus (genit. temporis) = time.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Existing, acting, or occurring at the same time; contemporary.

"Hence, if prolonged movements of approximately contemporaneous subside are generally widely extensive, as I am strongly inclined to believe from my examination of the Coral Reefs of the Gal. ocean, . . ."
—Brisson: Voyage round the World (ed. 1750), ch. xvii, p. 345.

¶ Followed by with.

"The great age of Jewish philosophy . . . had been contemporaneous with the later Spanish school of Arabic philosophy."—Milman: Latin Christianity, bk. xiv, ch. iii.

II. Technically:

1. Hist.: The term is sometimes used of persons existing at the same time, but not of the same age; the whole life of the one in such a case is not contemporaneous with the whole life of the other, but only a part of it is so.

2. Geol.: Formerly strata found partly with identical, partly with allied fossils, were held to be exactly contemporary, though fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, hère, camèl, hër, thère; pìne, pít, sìre, sìr, marine; gò, pòt, or, wëre, wòlf, wòrk, whò, sòn: müte, eüb, cüre, ünite, cür, rüle, füll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ä. ey = a. qu = kw.

widely separated on the earth's surface ; now the same facts are used to establish the contrary conclusion. If each species came into existence at a certain spot on the earth's surface, from which it gradually spread in various directions, it cannot have reached a remote region till some considerable time after its birth. Two strata, then, widely separated in the world, containing some species common to both, are contemporaneous in this sense, that they were formed while that species lived ; but the stratum near its birthplace is older than the one to which it spread after it had already multiplied greatly and rooted itself successively in all the intervening regions, wherever a place appropriate for its habitation could be found.

côn-têm-pô-râ-nê-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. contemporaneous; -ly.] At the same time with some other event ; simultaneously.

"... a history written contemporaneously with the events."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1856), ch. iii., § 1, vol. 1, p. 64.

côn-têm-pô-râ-nê-ous-ness, s. [Eng. contemporaneous; -ness.] The quality or state of being contemporaneous ; contemporaneity.

*côn-têm-pô-ra-rî-ness, s. [Eng. contemporary; -ness.] The quality or state of being contemporary ; contemporaneousness.

côn-têm-pô-ra-rî, a. & s. [Lat. con = cum = with, together, and temporarius = of or pertaining to time ; tempus (genit. temporis) = time.]

A. As adjective :

1. Living at the same time, contemporaneous.

"... framed by contemporary historians."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1856), ch. xiv., § 1, vol. ii., p. 488.

2. Done or caused by persons living at the same time ; belonging to the same times.

"None is founded on any ascertainable contemporary evidence."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1856), ch. viii., § 2, vol. 1, p. 277.

(1) Followed by with.

"Michael Drayton, contemporary with Shakespeare, ..."—Penny: British Zoology; the Horse.

(2) Followed by to.

"Albert Durer was contemporary to Lucas."—Dryden: Infancy's Art of Painting.

3. Existing at the same point of time.

"... bring ages past and future together, and make them contemporary."—Locke.

* 4. Of the same age, coeval.

"A grove born with himself he sees, And loves his old contemporary trees."—Coveley.

B. As subst. : One who lives or flourishes at the same time as another.

"... his contemporaries were not mistaken in considering him as a man of parts and vivacity."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

¶ It is commonly used by writers in newspapers and periodicals of other papers or periodicals published at the same time.

*côn-têm-pô-rîze, v.t. [Pref. con, Lat. tempus, genit. temporis = time, and suff. -ize.] To make contemporary ; to place in the same time or age.

"The indifference of their existences, contemporized into our notions, admits a further consideration."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

*côn-têm-pô-rîzed, pa. par. or a. [CONTEMPORIZE.]

*côn-têm-pô-rîz-îng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONTEMPORIZE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj. : (See the verb).

C. As subst. : The act of making contemporary.

côn-têmpt, *con-tempte, *con-tempt (p silent). [O. Fr. contempt, from Lat. contemptus = scorn, contempt, from contemptus, pa. par. of contemno.] [CONTEMN.]

I. Ordinary Language :

1. The act of contemning or despising others ; scorn, disdain.

"... a cruel contempt of public feeling."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 1.

2. The state or condition of being despised or scorned ; shame, disgrace.

"Men so the world shall love, religion hate, That all true zeal shall in contempt be brought."—Stirling: Dooms Day; The Second Hours.

* 3. An insult, an act expressive of contempt or disdain.

"After my fancy had run over the most obvious and common exaltations which men of mean fortunes are liable to, it descended to these little insults and contempts."—Spectator, No. 150.

II. Technically :

1. Law : An act of disobedience to the rules, orders, or regulations of a court or legislative assembly ; a failure to carry out the order of a court ; disorderly conduct or language tending to disturb the proceedings of any court or legislative assembly. Contempt, when committed outside the court itself, is punishable by an attachment ; when inside, which is of course a more aggravated offence than the former, it is punishable summarily by fine or imprisonment. Contempt of the sovereign's person is also a penal offence. A similar manifestation towards the government was once penal too, but every successive administration now expects much abuse from politicians of opposite politics to its own, and never thinks of bringing them to justice.

2. Parliamentary law and usage : Contempt of either House of Congress can be punished by the House insulted, which has the power of committing the offender.

*côn-têmpt-ful (p silent), a. [Eng. contempt; -ful.] Deserving of contempt or scorn ; contemptible.

*côn-têmpt-î-blî-îty (p silent), s. [Eng. contemptible; -ity.] The quality or condition of being held in or considered worthy of contempt ; despicableness.

"The contemptibility and vanity of this effeminate argument..."—Speed: Edward II., bk. ix., ch. xi.

côn-têmpt-î-ble (p silent), a. [Lat. contemptibilis, from contemptus.]

1. Worthy of contempt or scorn ; despicable, mean.

"Besides, how vile, contemptible, ridiculous."—Milton: Samson Agonistes, 1, 661.

2. Despised, scorned.

"The loss of a faithful creature is something, though of ever so contemptible a one..."—Pope: Letter to H. Cromwell (1709).

* 3. Feeling or expressing contempt ; scornful, contemptuous.

"If she should make tender of her love, 'tis very possible he'll scorn it; for the man... hath a contemptible spirit."—Shakspeare: Much Ado, ii. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between contemptible, pitiful, and despicable: "A person may be contemptible for his vanity or weakness; but he is despicable for his servility and baseness of character; he is pitiful for his want of manliness and becoming spirit. A lie is at all times contemptible; it is despicable when it is told for purposes of gain or private interest; it is pitiful when accompanied with indications of unmanly fear. It is contemptible to take credit to one's self for the good action one has not performed; it is despicable to charge another with the faults which we ourselves have committed; it is pitiful to offend others, and then attempt to screen ourselves from their resentment under any shelter which offers. It is contemptible for a man in a superior station to borrow of his inferiors; it is despicable in him to forfeit his word; it is pitiful in him to attempt to conceal by artifice." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ For the difference between contemptible and contemptuous, see CONTEMPTUOUS.

côn-têmpt-î-ble-ness (p silent), s. [Eng. contemptible; -ness.] The quality or state of being contemptible or worthy of scorn and contempt ; meanness, vileness, baseness.

"Who, by a steady practice of virtue, come to discern the contemptibleness of baits wherewith he allures us."—Decay of Piety.

côn-têmpt-î-blîy (p silent), adv. [Eng. contemptible(-ly); -ly.] In a contemptible or despicable manner ; meanly, basely.

*côn-têmpt-ion, *con-tempt-ci-on, s. [Lat. contemptio, from contemptus.]

1. An act of contempt, an insult.

"He maid therefore his oath to revenge this proud contemption done to Caratak."—Holland: Cron. F. 3.

2. Contempt or disobedience to a court of law.

côn-têmpt-î-ous (p silent), a. [Lat. contemptuosus, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

1. Acting in a manner expressive of contempt or scorn ; scornful, disdainful.

"Some much avers I found, and wondrous harsh, Contemptuous, proud, set on revenge and spite."—Milton: Samson Agonistes, 1, 662.

2. Done or said in a manner expressive of contempt or scorn.

"... assailed with savage invective and contemptuous sarcasm."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

* 3. Despised, contemned.

"Last of all, the contemptuous Samaritan."—Vocabulary of Johan Bale (1553). (Davies.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between contemptible and contemptuous: "Contemptible is applied to the thing deserving contempt; contemptuous to that which is expressive of contempt. Persons, or what is done by persons, may be contemptible or contemptuous; but a thing is only contemptible. A production is contemptible; a sneer or look is contemptuous." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côn-têmpt-î-ous-ly (p silent), adv. [Eng. contemptuous; -ly.] In a manner expressive of contempt or scorn ; scornfully, disdainfully ; with scorn, contempt, or disdain.

"But his objections were contemptuously overruled."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

*côn-têmpt-î-ous-ness (p silent), s. [Eng. contemptuous; -ness.] A disposition or tendency towards contempt or disdain ; insolence, scornfulness, haughtiness.

*côn-tên-ance, *con-ten-ance, *content-ance, s. [CONTENTANCE, s.]

*con-ten-ci-on, s. [CONTENTION.]

côn-tënd', v.i. & t. [Fr. contendre; Sp. & Port. contendere, from Lat. contendere; con = cum = with, together, and tendo = to stretch.]

A. Intransitive :

1. To struggle, to strive in opposition.

(a) Absolutely :

"His wonders and his praises do contend Which should be thine or his."—Shakspeare: Macbeth, i. 2.

(b) With the prep. with.

"Dundee rode forward for the purpose of surveying the force with which he was to contend..."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

(c) With the prep. against.

"In amittious strength I did Contend against thy valour."—Shakspeare: Coriolanus, iv. 8.

2. To exert oneself or strive in defence or support of anything. (With for.)

"... and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints."—Titus, 3.

3. To strive in debate ; to dispute or argue ; to support an opinion or statement.

(a) With for before the opinion, &c., supported.

"The question which our author would contend for..."—Locke.

(b) With about before the matter in dispute.

"He will find that many things he fiercely contended about were trivial."—Decay of Piety.

* 4. To reprove, to chide, to find fault.

"Thus contended I with the rulers."—Nehem. xiii. 11.

* 5. To exert oneself.

"Arise, contend thou before the mountains, and let the hills hear thy voice."—Micah vi. 1.

* 6. To use power or strength upon ; to punish.

"... behold, the Lord God called to contend by fire, and it devoured the great deep, and did eat up a part."—Amos vi. 4.

B. Trans. : To contend or struggle for ; to dispute, to contest.

"Their airy limbs in sports they exercise, And on the green contend the wrestler's prize."—Dryden: Virgil; Æneid vi. 874.

mostly decide contentions; but contested matters mostly depend upon others to decide."

côn-tënd'-éd, pa. par. or a. [CONTENT.]

* côn-tënd'-ent, s. [Lat. contendens, pr. par. of contendo.] One who contends with another; an opponent, an antagonist, a combatant.

"In all notable change and revolutions, the contendents have been still made a prey to the third party." —E. Strangely.

côn-tënd'-ér, s. [Eng. contend; -er.] One who contends.

con-tent-ment, s. [Fr. contentement; Ital. contentamento; Sp. contentamiento.]

1. The state or condition of being contented or satisfied.

"To make that calm contentment mine, Which virtue knows, or seems to know."—Byron: Hours of Idleness.

2. Pleasure, gratification.

"At Paris the prince spent one whole day, to give his mind some contentment in viewing of a famous city."—Wotton.

* 3. That which affords content, satisfaction, or gratification.

"... it may disrelish all the contentments, and contentment all the crosses, which this world can afford me."—Bishop Hall: Sotilogues, 57.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between contentment and satisfaction: "Contentment lies in ourselves; satisfaction is derived from external objects. . . . The contented man has always enough; the satisfied man receives enough. The contented man will not be dissatisfied; but he who looks for satisfaction will never be contented. Contentment is the absence of pain; satisfaction is positive pleasure. Contentment is accompanied with the enjoyment of what one has; satisfaction is often quickly followed with the alloy of wanting more. A contented man can never be miserable; a satisfied man can scarcely be long happy." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) con-tents, con-tents', s. pl. [CONTENT, s.]

* con-tent-ment, s. [Eng. continue; -ment.] Continuing, continuation.

"The sad impressions which our civil wars have left in their estates, in some to the shaking of their contentment."—Fuller: Worthies; Forkshire, il. 323. (Davies.)

"The servants have left the room, the guests sit conticent."—Thackeray: Virginians, ch. II. (Davies).

* con-tig-nā-tion, s. [Lat. contignatio, from con = cum = with, together, and tignum = a beam, a rafter.]

I. Literally:

1. The act of framing or putting together a fabric of wood.

2. A fabric of wood framed and put together; a contexture of beams; a story.

"... several stories or contignations, ..."—Wotton: Reliquiae, p. 28.

II. Figuratively:

1. The act or process of uniting closely or weaving together.

"Their own buildings . . . were without any party-wall, and linked by contignation into the edifice of France."—Barne.

2. Any immaterial framework or fabric. " . . . when they have the full sight of heaven above them they cannot climb up into it, they cannot possibly see that whole glorious contignation . . ."—Sp. Hall: The Free Prisoner.

* con-tig-nā-ate, a. [Lat. contiguus, and Eng. suff. -ate.] Contiguous, touching.

" . . . the two extremities are contiguous, yea and continue."—Holland: Plutarch, p. 817.

* con-tig-nue, a. [Fr. contigu.] Contiguous.

con-tig-nū-ty, s. [Fr. contiguité; Sp. contiguidad; Port. contiguidade; Ital. contiguità, all from Lat. contiguus.] [CONTIGUOUS.]

I. Ordinary Language:

(1) Contact with, or (more loosely) immediate proximity to, nearness in place.

"Contiguity or adjacency in private . . . possession."—Bacon: Fables of Persius.

(2) Continuous connection; continuity.

"Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness some boundless contiguity of shade."—Cowper: The Task, bk. II.

2. Mental Phil.: Proximity either in place or in time. These are two of the most potent of the influences which produce association of ideas.

"To me there appear to be only three principles of connexion among ideas, namely, resemblance, contiguity in time or place, and cause and effect."—Hume: Human Understanding, § 2.

con-tig-u-ous, a. [Lat. contiguus, from con = cum = with, together, and tangere = to touch; Ital. & Sp. contiguo; Fr. contigu.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Meeting so as to touch; adjoining, touching, close together, connected.

" . . . the two halves of the paper did not appear fully divided from one another, but seemed contiguous at one of their angles."—Newton: Opticks.

¶ Followed by with.

"Water, being contiguous with air, cooleth it, but moisteneth it not."—Bacon: Natural History.

2. Used more loosely in the sense of neighbouring, close, near.

"He sees his little lot the lot of all; Sees no contiguous palace near his head."—Goldsmith: The Traveller.

* 3. Connected in order of time, successive.

"The favours of our beneficent Saviour were at the least contiguous. No sooner hath he raised the centurion's servant from his bed, then he raises the widow's son from his bier."—Sp. Hall: Cont.; The Widow's Sonne Raised.

* 4. Connected as cause and effect; closely related.

"But the fancy is determined by habit to pass from the idea of fire to that of melted lead, on account of our having always perceived them contiguous and successive."—Beattie: Essay on Truth, pt. II. ch. II. § 4.

II. Technically:

1. Med.: Arising from contiguity.

2. Geometry:

Contiguous angles: [ADJACENT ANGLES].

† con-tig-u-ous-ness, s. [Eng. contiguous; -ness.] The quality or state of being contiguous; contiguity, close union, adjacency.

con-ti-nence, con-ti-nen-çy, * con-ti-nen-çie, * con-ty-nence, s. [Fr. continence; Sp. & Port. continencia; Ital. continenza, from Lat. continencia, from continere = to hold together, to restrain: con = cum = with, together; teneo = to hold.]

1. Self-restraint; self-command.

"He knew what to say; he knew also when to leave off, a continence which is practised by few writers."—Dryden: Fables, Pref.

2. A moderation or self-restraint in the indulgence of sexual enjoyment.

"To justice, continence and nobility; But let desert in pure election shine."—Shaksp.: Titus Andron., l. 1.

3. A forbearance from lawful pleasure.

"Content, without lawful ventry, is continence without unlawful chastity."—Grew: Cosmologia.

4. Chastity.

" . . . greater continence is found among the than among Christian men."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 78.

* 5. A continued course; a due succession; continuity.

"Answers ought to be made before the same judge before whom the depositions were produced, lest the continence of the course should be divided . . ."—Aylife: Purgation.

¶ For the difference between continence and chastity, see CHASTITY.

con-tin-ent, * con-ty-nent, a. & s. [Fr. continent, a. & s.; Sp. continente, a. & s.; Port. continente, a.; Ital. continente, a., from Lat. continens = (1) holding together; (2) bordering upon, adjacent (when used of a continent terra is to be supplied), pr. par. of continere = to hold together; con = together, and teneo = to hold tightly; to hold.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Subjectively:

(1) Reflexively (not in form, but in sense): Restraining one's self from indulgence in unlawful, or from over-indulgence in lawful, pleasures.

" . . . sobre, just, heoll, continent."—Wycliffe: Tyte, l.

(2) Half reflexively: Having, possessing, or acquiring that within the mind which exerts restraint upon one's desires.

"I pray you, have a continent forbearance till the speed of his rage goes slower . . ."—Shaksp.: King Lear, l. 2.

2. Objectively: Exercising, from a source external to one's self, restraint upon one; opposing, resisting.

" . . . my desire All continent impediments would o'erbear That did oppose my will."—Shaksp.: Macbeth, iv. 4.

II. Geography, &c.

† I. Continuous with.

"The north-east part of Asia, if not continent with the west side of America, . . ."—Brewster: On Languages.

* 2. Continental; enclosed within a continent or continents (in the sense B.).

" . . . the mayne and continent land of the whole world."—Grafton: Briteyn, pt. IV.

B. As substantive:

* I. Ord. Lang. (Gen.): That which contains any material thing, any person, or any abstract conception.

"I did not say that the Book of Articles only was the continent of the Church of England's publick doctrine."—Archbishop Laud: Conference with Fisher, p. 50.

II. Technically:

1. Geog.: A vast tract of land so much detached from the rest of the land in the world as to render it expedient to give it a distinctive name. There are generally said to be four continents: Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, to which some add a fifth, Australia. The division is, to a certain extent, arbitrary. Europe is not detached from Asia, but is continuous with it for about two thousand miles; whilst, on the contrary, North and South America are so dis severed that they should have received separate names, and figured as two continents instead of one. If Africa be taken as the type of a continent, then a continent differs from an island in not being wholly detached from the continents adjacent to it; but if America be regarded as the type of a continent, then a continent differs from an island only in being larger. Really, Europe, Asia, and Africa together constitute one island, by far the largest in the world; America a second, the next largest; and Australia another, the third largest; their size renders them worthy of being called continents.

2. Geol.: In essentially the same sense as B. I. 1. As the action of water tends to wash away all land and deposit it beneath the waves of the sea, whilst igneous agency, operating through volcanoes and earthquakes, and generally in the vicinity of the ocean, tends to heave it up, it is evident that if an sufficient length of time be given the continents will change their places, and they have done so in time past. This, to a certain extent, was understood by the ancient philosophers.

"The face of places, and their forms, decay. And that is solid earth, that once was sea; Seas, in their turn, retreating from the shore, Make solid land what ocean was before; And far from straits are shells of fishes found And rusty anchors fixed on mountain ground."—Dryden: Trans. from Ovid's Metamorphoses: The Pythagorean Philosophy.

Murchison considered that the original continents had been mostly submerged. Lyell founded his hypothesis, designed to explain the changes of climate in bygone geologic periods, by supposing successive gradual redistributions of sea and land quite different from those now prevailing. [CLIMATE.] Prof. Edward Forbes considered it probable that a "great Miocene land," by which he meant a land consisting of Miocene beds, subsequently upheaved, extended into the Atlantic far past the Azores, Great Britain, Ireland, and Spain, being parts of it. (Mem. Geol. Surv. Great Brit., vol. I.; Q. J. Geol. Soc., vol. III, pt. I., pp. IV.—[XVII.] Still, what may be called the nuclei of existing continents have existed since a remote geological period, though they have been submerged from time to time.

con-tin-ent-al, a. [Eng. continent; -al; Fr. continental.] Pertaining to a continent, esp. to the continent of Europe.

"The union of two great monarchies under one head would doubtless be approved by a continental coalition."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. II.

¶ Continental system:

Hist.: A project planned, and to a certain extent carried temporarily into effect, of cutting off Britain from all connexion with the Continent of Europe, with the view, if possible, of striking a mortal blow at her maritime and commercial supremacy. The first mention of it occurs in the armistice of Foligno, February 18, 1801, but it was not thoroughly developed till the issue of the Berlin Decree, November 19, 1806. This placed the British islands in a state of blockade [BLOCKADE, II.], forbade all commerce with them, made all goods coming from Britain or its colonies contraband, ordered all letters to or from it to be opened, and all British subjects to be arrested. All the Continental nations to which Napoleon could dictate were forced to carry out his system whether they liked it or no. Britain retaliated by successive Orders in Council, and finally the restiveness of the nations under the insupportable inconveniences produced by the decrees, not merely caused their practical abandonment, but aided in a considerable degree in producing the fall of Napoleon.

† con-tin-ent-ial-ist, s. [Eng. continental; -ist.] One who lives on, or is a native of, a continent.

"Robinson Crusoe and Peter Wilkins could only have been written by islanders. No continentalist could have conceived either tale."—Coleridge: Table Talk, p. 300.

con-tin-ent-ly, adv. [Eng. continent; -ly.] In a continent manner; chastely.

* con-tin-ent-ness, s. [Eng. continent; -ness.] The quality or state of being continent; self-command, self-control.

* con-tin-ge, v. i. [Lat. contingo = (1) to touch, (2) to happen.] [CONTIGUOUS.] To touch, to reach, to happen, to fall out.

con-tin-gence, s. [Lat. contingens, pr. par. of contingo = (1) to touch, (2) to happen.]

* 1. The state of being close or nearly connected; close union or connection.

"... loving respect through contingency of blood... -Dragon; Poly-Oblion, s. 1; Selden's Nota.

2. A chance or fortuitous occurrence; any possible or probable event.

con-tin'-gên-cy, s. [Eng. contingenc(e); -y.]

* 1. The act of reaching to or touching. "... he came to L. the point of contingency..." -Gregory; Posthuma, p. 39 (1650).

* 2. The quality or state of being contingent or fortuitous; accident, possibility. "... the contingency in events..." -Browne; Vulgar Errors.

3. A contingency, a chance or possible occurrence.

"Above contingency and time, Stable as earth, as heaven sublime." Blacklock: To Doctor Downman.

"... this, as previously shown, depends on various complex contingencies..." -Darwin; Descent of Man (1871), pt. II, ch. VIII, vol. I, p. 275.

* 4. An adjunct or accessory. "Contingencies of pomp..." -Wordsworth; Excursion, bk. IV.

Contingency with a double aspect:

Law: Provision with regard to a landed estate for two contingencies, viz., that a certain event will happen, and that on the other hand it will not happen. This prevents the intentions being frustrated in either case.

con-tin'-gên-t, a. & s. [Fr. contingent; Sp., Port., & Ital. contingente, all from Lat. contingens, pr. par. of contingo = to touch, to take hold of, to seize: con = together; and tango = to touch.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Dependent on an uncertain issue, of doubtful occurrence, which may or may not happen. "... things of their own nature contingent and mutable..." -Hooker; Eccl. Pol., bk. v, ch. XLVIII, § 4.

2. Logic: Applied to the matter of a proposition when the terms of it partly agree, and partly disagree.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: Anything which may or may not happen, anything of uncertain event. "By contingents we are to understand those things which come to pass without any human foresight..." -Grew; Cosmologia.

2. Mil.: The proportionate number of soldiers which a country or an individual of high rank is bound or engages to furnish towards a common enterprise; a quota of soldiers or other fighting men.

¶ (1) A contingent legacy:

Law: A legacy depending on a condition and lapsing if the condition be not fulfilled or the uncertain event fail to happen, as when a legacy is left to one provided he reach twenty-one years of age. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. II, ch. 32.)

(2) Contingent remainder:

Law: A remainder in which the estate either is to pass to an uncertain person or is to depend on a dubious event. It is called also an executory remainder. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. II, ch. 11.)

(3) Contingent uses:

Law: Uses depending upon a contingency. There must be a person seized to such uses when the contingency happens, else the use will be permanently destroyed. They are called also springing uses. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. II, ch. 20.)

con-tin'-gên-t-ly, adv. [Eng. contingent; -ly.] Accidentally, fortuitously; not according to any settled rule or law. "There could have been no prophesies, but only predictions, which were contingently true or false..." -Grew; Cosmologia Sacra, IV, 6.

con-tin'-gên-t-ness, s. [Eng. contingent; -ness.] The quality or state of being accidental, or dependent on chance.

con-tin'-u-a-ble, a. [Eng. continu(e); -able.] That may be continued.

con-tin'-u-al, con-tin'-u-el, con-tin'-u-ele, con-ty-n-u-el, a. [Fr. continuel, from Lat. continuus = holding together, unbroken: con = cum = with, together, and teno = to hold.]

1. Unbroken, incessant, unceasing, proceeding without interruption or cessation. "Where in bright traits, continual wonders rise." Thomson: Spring.

2. Constant, unvarying. "With Polna, and other his continual followers." Shakspeare: 2 Hen. IV., IV, 4.

3. Perpetual.

¶ (1) Continual claim:

Law: A claim to land repeated at intervals, none of them exceeding a year and a day. It was used when possession could not be taken without hazard. It was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 27 § 11.

(2) Continual proportionals:

Math.: Quantities or magnitudes in continued proportion (q.v.).

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between continual and continued: "Both these terms mark length of duration, but the former admits of a certain degree of interruption, which the latter does not. What is continual may have frequent pauses; what is continued ceases only to terminate. Rains are continual; noises in a tumultuous street are continued; the base in music is said to be continued; the mirth of a drunken party is one continued noise. Continual interruptions abate the vigour of application and create disgust: in countries situated near the poles, there is one continued darkness for the space of five or six months; during which time the inhabitants are obliged to leave the place. Continual respects the duration of actions only; continued is likewise applied to the extent or course of things: rumour are continual; talking, walking, running, and the like, is continual; but a line, a series, a scene, or a stream of water, is continued." (2) He thus discriminates between constant, continual, and perpetual: "What is continual admits of no interruption: what is perpetual admits of no termination. There may be an end to that which is continual, and there may be intervals in that which is perpetual. Rains are continual in the tropical climates at certain seasons; complaints among the lower orders are perpetual, but they are frequently without foundation. There is a continual passing and repassing in the streets of the metropolis during the day; the world, and all that it contains, are subject to perpetual change. Constant, like continual, admits of no interruption; but it may cease altogether. Continual respects the outward circumstances and events; constant the temper of mind." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

con-tin'-u-al-ly, con-ty-n-u-al-liche, con-tin'-u-el-y, con-ty-n-u-el-liche, adv. [Eng. continual; -ly.]

1. Without a pause; uninterruptedly. "He reigned therynne continuallche thertyr yere." Trevisa, II, 29.

2. Without ceasing; incessantly. "Alle manere of melody..." -Hampton; Pricks of Conscience, 5, 913.

3. Used loosely for frequently, often, constantly.

* con-tin'-u-al-ness, s. [Eng. continual; -ness.] The quality of being continual; continuance, permanence.

con-tin'-u-a-nce, con-tin'-u-aunce, s. [Lat. continuans, pr. par. of continuo = to join together, to continue.] [CONTINUAL.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality or state of holding or keeping together; resistance to separation of parts; continuity. "Wool, tow, cotton, and raw silk, have, besides the desire of continuance in regard to the tenacity of their thread, a greediness of moisture..." -Bacon.

2. Uninterrupted succession. "The brute immediately regards his own preservation, or the continuance of his species..." -Addison; Spectator.

3. Permanence or constancy in one state.

4. Lastingness, duration. "... great plagues, and of long continuance..." -Deut. xxviii, 59.

5. Perseverance, unceasing action. "... patient continuance in well-doing..." -Rom. II, 7.

6. Perseverance or constancy in conduct; fixedness of purpose or resolution. "Continuance is a steadfast and constant abiding in a purposed and well advised matter, not yielding to any man in quarrel of the right..." -Wilson; The Arts of Rhetorick, p. 85.

7. Progress of time. "In thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fulfilled..." -Ps. cxxxix, 14.

8. Abode or continuing in one place. "I stay'd..." -Shakspeare: 1 Hen. VI., II, 5.

9. Permanence.

"This forenamed toad bath yet in her the continuance of her first affection..." -Shakspeare: Meas. For Meas., III, 1.

II. Law:

1. English: The naming of a day to which a trial, not concluded, will be adjourned. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. III, ch. 21.)

¶ Notice of trial by continuance: Notice by a prosecutor or plaintiff, who is not ready to proceed, that he wishes the trial to be adjourned by continuance to some other sitting in place of allowing it to be fallen from. (Wharton.)

2. United States: The deferring of a trial or snit from one stated term of the court to another. (Webster.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between continuance, continuation, and duration: "Continuance and duration are both employed for time; things may be of long continuance, or of long duration: but continuance is used only with regard to the conduct of men; duration with regard to the existence of every thing. Whatever is occasionally done, and soon to be ended, is not for a continuance; whatever is made, and soon destroyed, is not of long duration; there are many excellent institutions in England which promise to be of no less continuance than of utility. Duration is with us a relative term; things are of long or short duration: by comparison, the duration of the world and all subinary objects is nothing in regard to eternity." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* con-tin'-u-ate, v. t. [CONTINUE, a.] To join closely together.

* con-tin'-u-ate, a. [Lat. continuatus.]

1. Closely or immediately united. "... while it is continue and undivided..." -Pecham.

¶ Followed by with. "... our very flesh and bones should be made continue with his..." -Hooker.

2. Uninterrupted, unbroken, continual. "... an untriable and continue goodness..." -Shakspeare: Timon, I, 1.

* con-tin'-u-â-téd, pa. par. or a. [CONTINUE, v.]

* con-tin'-u-ate-ly, adv. [Eng. continue; -ly.] Continuously, uninterruptedly; with continuity.

* con-tin'-u-ate-ness, s. [Eng. continue; -ness.] The quality or state of being continue; freedom from interruption; continuity.

* con-tin'-u-â-tîng, a. [CONTINUE, v.] Joining, connecting, uniting.

con-tin'-u-â-tion, s. [Lat. continuatio, from continuo.]

I. Literally:

1. The act of continuing or carrying on without interruption or cessation. "... for the purpose of preventing the continuation of the royal blood..." -Macaulay; Hist. Eng., bk. II, ch. xxiv.

2. That which is carried on; an extension. "... I could send you either the Miscellany, or my continuation of the version of Statius..." -Pope; Letter to H. Cromwell, March 7, 1709.

3. An extension or prolongation; as, the continuation of a line.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. A restraint or keeping together; moderation. "And it is no wonder, if the continuation and natural composure of the spirits be rest and ease to the soul..." -More; Immort. of the Soul, bk. II, ch. x.

* 2. A prorogation. (Scott.)

3. (Pl.): A euphemism for garters, as a kind of continuation of "short clothes" or knee breeches; afterwards applied to trousers. (Slang.)

"A sleek man... in drab shorts and continuations..." -Dickens; Sketches by Bos.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between continuation, continuity, and continuing: "Continuation is the act of continuing; continuity is the quality of continuing; the former is employed in the figurative sense for the duration of events and actions; the latter in the physical sense for the adhesion of the component parts of the bodies. The continuation of a history up to the existing period of the writer is the work of every age, if not of every year: there are bodies of so little continuity that they will crumble to pieces on the slightest touch."

bell, boy; pout, fowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing -etan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = shün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

(2) For the difference between continuance and continuance, see CONTINUANCE.

* côn-tin'-q-â-tive, a. & s. [Eng. continual(s); -ive.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having permanence or duration; continuous, permanent.

2. Continuing or extending.

B. As substantive:

1. Logic: That which contains the idea of continuance, permanence, or duration.

"To these may be added continuatives: as, Rome remains to this day . . ."—Watts: Logic.

2. Gram.: A word which serves to connect two sentences, or to continue a sentence.

"Continuatives . . . consolidate sentences into one continuous whole. . . ."—Harris: Hermes, bk. II.

côn-tin'-q-â-tôr, s. [Eng. continual(s); -or.]

* 1. One who continues or keeps up the uninterrupted succession of a series.

2. One who continues or carries on the work of another; a continuator.

côn-tin'-q-e, * con-ty-n-ue, * con-tune, v.t. & i. [Fr. continuer; Sp. continuar; Ital. continuare, from Lat. continuo = to continue, to last.] [CONTINUAL.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. To join together, to unite, to connect.

"The use of the navel is to continue the infant onto the mother. . . ."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

2. To carry on without interruption.

" . . . the series of a constant continued succession is lost . . ."—Locke.

3. To protract, extend, or lengthen; to draw out.

"The dark abyss, whose boiling gulph Tameless endur'd a bridge of wood-rose length, From hell continued, reaching th' utmost orb Of this frail world."—Milton: P. L., bk. II.

4. To carry on the work of another; to complete.

" . . . our humble author will continue the story . . ."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., Epilogue.

* 5. To delay.

* 6. To prorogue. (Scotch.)

7. To extend or protract in duration; not to suffer to cease.

"O continue thy lovingkindness unto them that know thee; and thy righteousness to the upright in heart."—Ps. xxvii. 10.

8. To persevere or persist in, to keep up, not to cease or leave off.

"You know how to make yourself happy, by only continuing such a life as you have been long accustomed to lead."—Pope.

9. To retain or suffer to remain; not to get rid of.

* 10. To allow to live, to prolong the life of.

"And how shall we continue Claudio?"—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

II. Geom.: To extend or protract a line beyond a certain point; to produce.

B. Intransitive:

1. To remain in the same state, position, or place.

" . . . the multitude . . . continues with me now three days, and have nothing to eat. . . ."—Matt. xv. 32.

2. To endure; to last or be durable.

" . . . thy kingdom shall not continue . . ."—1 Sam. xiii. 14.

3. To persevere or persist, not to omit or cease.

" . . . they continued out to my covenant. . . ."—Heb. viii. 9.

4. Not to leave off.

" . . . they continued to occupy their old positions."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

5. To remain in connection with, not to leave or forsake.

"They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us. . . ."—1 John II. 19.

necessity and circumstances in remaining. A person continues in office as long as he can perform it with satisfaction to himself, and his employers; a sentinel remains at his post or station. Continue is opposed to cease; remain is opposed to go. Things continue in motion; they remain stationary. Remain and stay are both perfectly neuter in their sense, but remain is employed for either persons or things; stay for persons only. Remain is often involuntary, if not compulsory; stay is altogether voluntary."

A. As pr. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adjective:

1. Remaining in the same state.

* 2. Permanent, lasting, durable, abiding.

"For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come."—Heb. xiii. 14.

* 3. Unceasing, continual.

C. As substantive:

1. The act of producing, extending, or protracting.

2. The act or state of remaining in the same place or condition.

* côn-tin'-q-îng-lý, * con-ty-n-u-yng-ly, adv. [Eng. continuing; -ly.] Uninterruptedly; without cessation or interruption.

1. Ord. Lang.: Uninterrupted connexion; union, without a break or interval.

2. Technically:

(1) Med.: Uninterrupted cohesion of the texture of any organ or part of the body.

"The solid parts may be contracted by dissolving their continuity; for a fibre, cut through, contracts itself."—Arbuthnot.

"Continuity of texture disposes, as is well known, to the extension of a diseased state, originating at some point. So also does contiguity."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. xii., p. 384.

(2) Geol. (Chiefly of time): In the same sense as 1. The doctrine that there never has been a universal destruction of animal or vegetable life in bygone geologic times, and that the gaps which now occur between strata are only local, and if they appear universal, are produced not by such catastrophes as the older geologists imagined to account for them, but by deficiencies in our knowledge. Two great breaks were once supposed to exist—one between the Permian and the Triassic, which separated the palæozoic from the mesozoic or secondary rocks, and the other between the Chalk and the Eocene, separating the mesozoic and the caenozoic or tertiary. Both still exist, but intermediate rocks, called the Lignitic series, 4,000 ft. thick, have been found in America, partially filling the latter gap. It is believed that were all the existent strata, including those under the modern oceans, known, and all which have been destroyed by denudation replaced, the first and all other gaps would disappear. The doctrine of geological continuity is essential to Darwinism, but it can be and is held also by the advocates of successive separate creations. (Nicholson, &c.)

" . . . to discuss the question of what may be called geological continuity."—Nicholson: Patron, (2nd ed.), II. 48.

(3) Continued fractions:

Arith. & Alg.: A series of fractions of which the first has a fraction in the denominator, which fraction has again a fraction in the denominator, and so onward—if need be, on to infinity. They are used in solving numerical equations and problems on indeterminate analysis.  $\frac{1}{2 + \frac{1}{4}}$  is a continued fraction.

(4) Continued proportion:

Arith. & Alg.: Proportion in which the consequent of the first ratio becomes the antecedent of the second, the consequent of the second the antecedent of the third, and so on; as, 8 : 6 :: 6 : 12 :: 12 : 24, &c.

côn-tin'-q-ô, adv. [Ital.]

Music: Continued.

côn-tin'-q-ôus, a. [Lat. continuus.] [CONTINUAL.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Joined together, connected; with no intervening space.
... for I believe that many perfectly defined species have been formed on strictly continuous areas —Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. IV, p. 174.

2. Continual, unceasing.

"Though he behold it not, he can hear its continuous murmur." Longfellow: Evangeline, pt. II. 1.

3. Unbroken, uninterrupted.

"... they were detached notices and morsels of evidence, but not a continuous narrative." Lewis: Crest, Early Roman Hist. (1835), ch. XIII, pt. 1, § 9, vol. II, p. 361.

II. Technically:

1. Botany:

(1) Of inflorescence, the pinnae of leaves, &c.: Uninterrupted, symmetric or normal in form through its whole length. The inflorescence of most plants is continuous, so are the pinnae of most pinnate leaves. The opposite of continuous is interrupted (q.v.).

(2) Of stems: Not jointed. It is opposed to articulated. (Treas. of Bot.)

2. Philol.: (See extract.)

"The most natural primary division of the consonants is into those which require a total stoppage of the breath at the moment previous to their being pronounced, and which, therefore, cannot be prolonged; and those in pronouncing which the interruption is partial, and which can, like the vowel sounds, be prolonged ad libitum. The former have received the designation of explosive, and the latter of continuous." Dr. Carpenter: Prin. of Human Physiol., § 941.

continuous bearings, s. pl.

Railway Engin.: Sleepers laid longitudinally under the metals of a railway, instead of across the way.

continuous break, s.

Railway Engin.: A kind of break which when set in action affects the wheels of the whole train, and not only of the carriage in which it is worked.

continuous current, s.

Elect.: Same as DIRECT CURRENT.

continuous impost, s.

Arch.: The mouldings of an arch continued along the pillar that supports it, and down to the ground, without any member to mark the impost point—that is, the point at which the arch and pillar meet.

continuous rail, s. A rail made in sections with a longitudinal vertical joint, and the sections laid together, breaking joint.

côn-tin'-n-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. continuous; -ly.] In a continuous manner; without break or interruption.

†côn-tin'-n-ous-ness, s. [Eng. continuous; -ness.] The quality or state of being continuous; continuity.

*con-tir'-mont, adv. [Fr. contremont.] Against the hill; upwards; the contrary way.

côn-line, s. [Perhaps Eng. cant; line.]

1. Nautical: The space between the bilges of casks which are stowed alongside of each other.

2. Rope-making: The space between the strands on the outside of a rope. In working, this space is filled up with spun yarn or small rope, which brings the rope so treated to a nearly cylindrical shape, either to strengthen it or to render the surface smooth and fair for serving or parcelling. (Knight.)

côn-tor'-ni-âte, côn-tor'-ni-a'-tô, s. [Ital. contorniato, pa. par. of contorniare, contornare = to make a circuit or furrow; contorno = a circuit or furrow.]

Numis.: A name applied to a medal or metallion of bronze, having a furrow on both sides, supposed to have been struck in the days of Constantine the Great and his successors, and to have been used as a ticket for admission to the public games of Rome and Constantinople. (Used also attributively.)

côn-tor'-sion, s. [CONTORTION.]

*côn-tort', v. t. [Lat. contortus, pa. par. of contortere = to writhe or twist together; con = cum = with, together, and torqueo = to twist.] To twist, writhe, or curl, to bend.

—Ray. "The vertebral arteries are variously contorted."

*côn-tort'-œ, côn-tor'-ti, s. pl. [Fem. & masc. pl. of Lat. contortus.] [CONTORT, v.]

Bot.: The names given by Linnaeus to the twenty-ninth of his natural order of plants; that containing Vinca, Aaclepias, &c. They were applied on account of the contorted aestivation of some of these plants.

côn-tort'-éd, pa. par. or a. [CONTORT.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Twisted, curled.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Applied to a corolla which has the edge of one petal lying obliquely over the next, or to the portions of a leaf or to leaves similarly folded.

2. Geol.: Applied to strata which are curved

CONTORTED STRATA.

or twisted about as if by lateral pressure while in a soft state.

côn-tor'-ti, s. pl. [CONTORTÆ.]

côn-tor'-tion, *côn-tor'-sion, s. [Fr. contorsion; Lat. contortio, from contortus, pa. par. of contortere.] [CONTORT.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of twisting, bending, or curving. "... disruption they would be in danger of, upon a great and sudden stretch or contortion."—Ray: On the Creation.

2. A twist, bending, or flexure, a writhing movement.

"How can she acquire those hundred graces and motions, and airs, the contortions of every muscular motion in the face?"—Swift.

II. Technically:

1. Med.: Partial dislocation of a limb or member of the body.

2. Bot.: Any unnatural twisting of the branches or other organ.

†côn-tor'-tion-ist, s. [Eng. contortion; -ist.] One who practises the twisting or bending of the body in various contortions.

*côn-tor'-tious, a. [Eng. contort; -tious.] Twisted, bent, curved; affected by contortions.

*côn-tor'-tious-ness, s. [Eng. contortious; -ness.] The quality or state of being twisted, bent, or contorted.

*côn-tort'-ive, a. [Eng. contort; -ive.] Expressive of contortion.

côn-tor'-tū'-pli-cate, a. [Lat. contortu(s) = twisted, and plicatus = folded, pa. par. of plicare = to fold.]

Bot.: Applied to a leaf, &c., turned back on itself.

côn-tour', s. [Fr.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The outline or defining line of any figure or body.

II. Technically:

1. Fine Arts: A line or lines representing the outline of a figure.

"Titan's coloring and contours..."—Drummond: Travels, p. 64 (1754).

2. Fortif.: The horizontal outline of works of defence. When the conformation of the ground or works is described by contours or horizontal sections, these sections are taken at some fixed vertical interval from each other suited to the scale of the drawing or the subject in hand, and the distances of the surface at each interval above or below some assumed plane of comparison are given in figures at the most convenient places on the plan. (Ogilvie, &c.)

3. Surv.: The outline of the surface of the ground with regard to its undulations.

† (1) Natural contour: The form of the ground surface with respect to its undulations.

(2) Line of contour: A horizontal plane intersecting a portion of ground.

contour lines, s. pl.

Civil Engineering: Lines on a map or plan of a survey of a district joining the several levels together.

*côn-tourb, v. t. [CONTURS.]

côn-tour-né, n. [Fr.]

Her.: Applied to a beast represented standing, passant, conrant, &c., with its face to the sinister side of the escutcheon.

côn-tour'-ni-â-téd, a. [CONTORNIATE.]

Numis.: Applied to medals, &c., having the edges appearing as though they had been turned in a lathe.

côn-tra, prep. [Lat.] A Latin preposition meaning against or opposite, used largely in composition in English, to denote opposition, resistance, or contrariety. In compound words in music it signifies an octave below, e.g.: Contra-gamba, a 16 ft. gamba; contra-basso, a double bass; contra-fagotto, a double bassoon, &c. (Stainer & Barrett.)

contra-dance, s. [Fr. contredanse; Sp. controdanza.] A kind of dance in which the partners are ranged face to face or in opposita lines to each other. It is frequently corrupted, both in speech and writing, into country-dance.

contra-rotation, s. [Lat. contra, and Eng. rotation (q.v.).] Circular motion in a direction contrary to some other circular motion.

côn-tra-bãnd, a. & s. [Ital. contrabbando = contrary to proclamation; Fr. contrebande.] [BAN.]

A. As adj.: Prohibited, unlawful, illegal; excluded or forbidden by proclamation or law.

"... many false helps, and contraband wares of beauty..."—Spectator, No. 33.

† Contraband goods, Contraband of war: (See extract.)

"When two nations are engaged in war, if there be any foreign article or articles necessary for the defence or subsistence of either of them, and without which it would be difficult for it to carry on the contest, the other may legitimately exert every means in its power to prevent its opponent being supplied with such article or articles. All writers of authority on international law admit this principle; and lay it down that a nation which should furnish a belligerent with articles contraband of war—that is, with supplies of warlike stores or any article required for the prosecution of the war—would forfeit her neutral character, and that the other belligerent would be warranted in preventing such succours from being sent and confiscating them as lawful prize."—McCulloch: Commercial Dictionary.

contractile force, s.

Physics : A force by which a body, from heat or other cause, recedes into smaller dimensions from those which it previously occupied. The property is taken advantage of when, before the tire of a wheel is put on the circumference of a wheel, it is made red hot, that, when cooled, it may grasp the wheel with exceeding force. Iron bars screwed when hot into walls which have bulged will in cooling force them back into their places.

contractile tissue, s.

Anat. : Any tissue of which the property is, in certain circumstances, to contract, muscular tissue. [CONTRACTILITY.]

"... those depressing causes which usually put a stop to the action of contractile tissue."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I., ch. II., p. 66.

contractile vesicles or vacuoles, s. pl.

Zool. : Certain clear spaces in the Protozoa which alternately contract and dilate. They are thus marked off from the permanent and food vacuoles.

con-trăct-il-i-tý, s. [Eng. contractile(s); -ity; Fr. contractilité.] Capability of contracting.

"A muscle when stimulated shortens itself, and therefore it is said to possess the property of contractility."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I., ch. I., p. 55.

¶ Vital contractility :

Anat. : The property which a muscle has during life to contract or shorten itself under the operation of the will, or by mechanical, electric, or other stimulus. It continues for a short time after death. It is sometimes called irritability, but in this case that word is used in a limited sense.

con-trăct-îng, pr. par., a, & s. [CONTRACT, v.]

A. As pr. par. : (See the verb).

B. As adjective :

contradanso, s. [CONTRA-DANCE.]

côn-tră-dict', v. t. & i. [Lat. contradictus, pa. par. of contradico = to speak against, to contradict: contra = against, and dico = to speak.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To oppose in words; to gainsay; to deny the truth of any statement or assertion; to assert the opposite to any statement.

"Dear Duff, I prythee, contradict thyself,
And say it is not so."
Shakesp.: Macbeth, ll. 4.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. To oppose, to be contrary to.

"Are worthlet of the mind's regard; with these
The future cannot contradict the past."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. v.

2. To oppose, to hinder, to resist.

"When was the hour
I ever contradicted your desire
Or made it not mine too?"
Shakesp.: Ham. VIII., ll. 4.

B. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To oppose in words, to deny or gainsay.

"... they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming."
Acts XIII. 45.

* 2. Fig.: To be opposed or contrary to.

"Yet more there be, who doubt His ways not just,
As to His own edicts found contradicting."
Milton: Samson Agonistes.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to contradict, to deny, and to oppose: "Contradict and deny are performed by words only; oppose either by words or actions: we contradict an assertion, deny a fact, oppose a person or his opinions; we may contradict ourselves or others; we oppose others only; if liars have not excellent memories they are sure to contradict themselves on a close examination; those who oppose others should be careful not to do it from a spirit of opposition. Contradict is likewise used in denying what is laid to one's charge; but we may deny without contradicting, in answer to a question: contradiction respects indifferent matters; denying is always used in matters of immediate interest."
(Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

côn-tră-dict-éd, pa. par. & a. [CONTRADICT.]

côn-tră-dict-ér, *côn-tră-dict-ôr, s. [Eng. contradict; -er.] One who contradicts, opposes, or gainsays; an opposer.

côn-tră-dict-ing, pr. par. & s. [CONTRADICT.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of gainsaying, denying, or opposing; contradiction.

côn-tră-dic-tion, s. [Lat. contradictio, from contradictus.] [CONTRADICT.]

I. Lit.: The act of opposing in words; a gainsaying or denial of any statement or assertion.

"The mark, at which my juster aim I take,
Is contradiction for his own dear sake."
Cowper: Conversation.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. Opposition by words or acts.

"... consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself. . . ."—Heb. xii. 3.

* 2. Inconsistency, incongruity, or disagreement with itself.

"Can he make deathless death? That were Strange contradiction."
Milton: P. L., x. 798.

* 3. Direct contrariety or opposition, repugnancy.

"Laws human must be made without contradiction unto any positive law in scripture."
—Hooker.

4. One who or that which is inconsistent with itself.

"And yet in both rejoicing; man unbless;
Of contradictions infinite the slave."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

¶ A contradiction in terms: An expression involving an inconsistency, a statement one part of which contradicts the other; as, "an honest thief," "a square circle."

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Opposed, inconsistent, or contradicting.

"The Jews hold, that in case two rabbies should happen to contradict one another, they were yet bound to believe the contradictory assertions of both."
—South: Sermons.

* 2. Inclined or given to contradiction.

II. Logic: Involving contradiction, applied to two propositions, differing from each other in quantity and quality, both of which cannot, and one of which must be, true. (¶)

¶ Contradictory propositions:

Logic: Propositions of which one is universal, and the other, which is not so, denies not the whole of the assertion made by the first, but only a portion of it. It is thus briefly stated: "Some A's are not B's." If the first proposition asserts that snow falls in every country in winter, a contradictory proposition denies only the universality of the statement, but admits it to be true in a more limited degree. In other words, it admits that snow falls in winter in many cases, but denies that it does so in all. [Contradictory differ from Contrary propositions. [CONTRARY PROPOSITIONS.]]

B. As subst.: A proposition which is in the fullest degree contradictory to another.

"... to make the same thing to be determined to one, and to be not determined to one, which are contradictories."
—Bramhall: Answer to Hobbes.

côn-tră-dis-tinct, a. [Lat. contra, and Eng. distinct (q.v.).] Distinguished by opposite qualities.

"... the several contradistinct parts of the body. . ."

1. To counterfeit, to pretend.

2. To imitate.

* côn-tră-fass-ture (fiss as fish), s. [Lat. contra = against, and Eng. fissure, from Lat. fissura.]

Anat.: For def. see extract.

"Conclusions, when great, do usually produce a fissure or crack of the skull; either in the same part where the blow was inflicted, and then it is called fissure; or in the contrary part, in which case it obtains the name of contrafissure."
—Wiseman.

côn-tră-har-môn-i-cal, a. [Lat. contra, and Eng. harmonical.] The opposite of harmonical.

¶ Contra-harmonical proportion:

Math.: Proportion in which the difference between the first and second terms is to the difference between the second and third as the third is to the first. Thus a, b, and c are in contra-harmonical proportion if a - b : b - c :: c : a. The three numbers 5, 15, and 10 are in contra-harmonic proportion, for  $5 \sim 15 : 15 \sim 10 :: 10 : 5$ ; i. e.,  $10 : 5 :: 10 : 5$ .

* côn-tră-hênt, a. & s. [Lat. contrahens, pr. par. of contraho = to contract.] [CONTRACT.]

I. As adj.: Contracting, covenanting.

II. As subst.: One who contracts or covenants; a contracting party.

* côn-trai-man, s. [COUNTRYMAN.]

* côn-tră-in-dic-cant, s. [Lat. contra, and Eng. indicate (q.v.).] A symptom which forbids to treat a subject or matter as a disease in the usual manner.

"Throughout it was full of contraindicants."
—Burke.

*côn-tră-rêg-n-lâr'-i-tÿ, s. [Lat. contra = against, and Eng. regularity (q.v.).] An opposition or contrariety to rule.

" . . . It is not so properly an irregularity as a contraregularity."—Norris.

*côn-tră-rê-môn'-strant, s. [Lat. contra = against, and Eng. remonstrant (q.v.).]

1. Gen.: One who remonstrates in opposition or answer to a remonstrant.

"As for their plea, that they came to defend their opinion no otherwise than the contra-remonstrants did for theirs, it was replied, first that they did the synod wrong to make this distinction of contra-remonstrants and remonstrants; for in the synod there was no contra-remonstrant, and no man was called thither under that name, whereas they in their letters came under the name of remonstrants."—Hales: To Sir D. Carlton (1614).

2. Specially (Plural):

Ch. Hist.: A name given in Holland in the 17th century to the Calvinists who presented a petition termed the "Counter-remonstrance" to the "Remonstrance" sent to the States of Hellaad and West Friesland in 1610 by the Arminians. *côn-tră-r-î-ant-ly, adv. [Eng. contrariant; -ly.] In a contradictory manner; contrarily. (Coleridge.)

*côn-tră-r-î-e, v.t. [CONTRARY.] To oppose, to thwart.

"Our country law contrârd'd that desire, To which our loves so wholly did incline."—Harrington: Orlando, bk. XIII, § 9.

*côn-tră-r-î-ênde, a. [CONTRARIANT.] Contrary, opposing.

*côn-tră-r-î-ent, s. [Fr. contrariant, pr. par. of contrarier = to oppose.]

Eng. Hist.: The name given to Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, and the barons who took part with him against Edward II, because in respect of their great power it was not fit to call them rebels or traitors. (Ogilvie.)

*côn-tră-r-îes, s. pl. [CONTRARY, s.]

Logic: Propositions which are contradictory to and destroy each other, but of which the falsehood of one does not establish the truth of the other.

"If two universals differ in quality, they are contraries; as, 'every vine is a tree, no vine is a tree.'"—Watts: Logic.

*côn-tră-r-î-ê-tÿ, s. [Lat. contrarietas, from contra = against.]

1. Ordinary Language:

I. The state of being contrary or opposed.

"There is nothing more common than contrariety of opinions. . . ."—Locke.

2. Repugnance, disagreement, opposition.

"He which will perfectly recover a sick, and restore a diseased, body unto health, must not endeavour so much to bring it to a state of simple contrariety, as of fit proportion in contrariety unto those evils which are to be cured."—Hooker.

3. A repugnant or opposed quality; an inconsistency.

"All that I have I give thee; and then see All contrarieties unite in thee."—Cooper: Translations; The Nativity.

4. A proposition inconsistent with or opposed to another.

"He will be here, and yet he is not here: How can these contrarieties agree?"—Shakesp.: Henry VI., II, 2.

II. Metaphys.: An associative principle of the mind, whereby the presence of cold, for instance, raises the idea of heat, hunger of eating, &c.

*côn-tră-r-î-ly, *con-tra-ri-ly, *con-tra-ri-lye, adv. [Eng. contrary; -ly.]

*côn-tră-r-î-ôus-ly, *con-tra-ry-ous-lye, adv. [Eng. contrarious; -ly.] In a contrary manner; oppositely, contrarily.

" . . . many things, having full references To one consent, may work contrariously."—Shakesp.: Henry V., I, 2.

*côn-tră-r-î-ôus-tÿ, *con-tra-ri-ouste, s. [Eng. contrarious; -ty.] Contrariety, opposition.

*côn-tră-r-î-sômê (Eng.), *côn-tră-r-î-sûm (Scotch), a. [Eng. &c. contrary, and some (q.v.).] Perverse, obstinate.

*côn-tră-r-î-wîse, adv. [Eng. contrary, and wise (q.v.).]

1. In a contrary or opposite manner; on the contrary.

"Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing; but contrariwise blessing. . . ."—I Peter, III, 9.

2. Conversely.

"Every thing that acts upon the fluids, must, at the same time, act upon the solids, and contrariwise."—Arbuthnot: On Animals.

*côn-tră-r-î, *côn-tră-r-ÿ, *con-tra-rie, *con-tra-rye, *con-trair, *con-trare, *con-troyte, a., adv., & s. [Fr. contrair; Prov. contrari; Sp., Port., & Ital. contrario, all from Lat. contrarius = lying over against; contra = over against.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Lying over against, opposite.

1. In opposition to. Used—

"And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me; I will bring seven times more plagues upon you according to your sin."—Lev. XXVI, 21.

(b) Disposed habitually to oppose; wayward, perverse, forward.

2. Opposite, different, excluding something else.

"Whom when the Lady saw so faire a sight All ignorant of her contrary sex."—Spenser: F. Q., III, I, 47.

¶ Opposites complete while contraries exclude one another. Thus sweet and sour are opposites, sweet and bitter are contraries. (Trench: On the Study of Words.)

II. Logic: [Contrary propositions].

B. As adv.: Contrarily, in opposition.

C. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: A thing opposed or opposite to another one.

"No contraries hold more antipathy Than I and such a knife."—Shakesp.: King Lear, II, 2.

¶ (1) On the contrary: On the other hand.

"He pleaded still not guilty. . . ."

The king's attorney on the contrary Urged on the examinations, proofs, confessions, Of diverse witnesses. . . ."

(2) The contrary: The opposite of a motion put from the chair, that if any are opposed to it they may have an opportunity of giving visible expression to their views.

(3) To the contrary: To an opposite purpose.

"They did it, not for want of instruction to the contrary."—Stillingfleet.

II. Logic & Ord. Lang.: A proposition contrary to some other one.

"The instances brought by our author are but slender proofs of a right to civil power, and dominion in the first-born, and do rather show the contrary."—Locke.

¶ (1) Contrary motion: Melodia or chords proceeding in opposite directions. (Stainer & Barrett.)

(2) Contrary propositions:

Logic: Propositions which contradict every applicable case of each other. The two pro-fate, făt, fare, amidst, whăt, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôl, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, nûite, cûr, rûle, fûll; try, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē: ev = ā. qu = kw.

positions, "every A is B," and "no A is B," are contrary propositions. If it be asserted by one that every star is shining, and this be met by the counter-assertion that no star is shining, the two statements are contrary propositions.

(3) Contrary terms:

Logic: Terms more opposed to each other than any of the same class, as black and white, rich and poor.

* 2. To plot, to scheme, to form designs.

" . . . have you with these contrived To bait me?"—Shakespeare: Mida. Night's Dream, iii. 2.

¶ Crabbs thus discriminates between contrite, to devise, and to invent: "To contrive and devise do not express so much as to invent: we contrive and devise in small matters; we invent in those of greater moment. Contriving and devising respect the manner of doing things; inventing comprehends the action and the thing itself; the former are but the new fashioning of things that already exist; the latter is, as it were, the creation of something new: to contrive and devise are intentional actions, the result of a specific effort; invention naturally arises from the exertion of an inherent power; we require thought and combination to contrive or devise; ingenuity is the faculty which is exerted in inventing. Contriving requires even less exercise of the thoughts than devising: we contrive on familiar and common occasions; we devise in seasons of difficulty and trial. A contrivance is simple and obvious to a plain understanding; a device is complex and far-fetched; it requires a ready conception and a degree of art."

*con-trib-ŷt (2), v.t. [Apparently from Lat. contriti, pret. of contrito=to pass, to spend.] To wear away, to pass, to spend, to employ (as time). (N.E.D.)

"Cornelius contrived (contrit) all his youths in the service of their wars."—Frank of Polsgore Terpi (Comden Soc.), l. 51.

¶ In the following it may be contrive (1).

"Please ye we may contrive this afternoon, And quaff carouses to our mistresses' health."—Shakespeare: Tam. of Shrove, l. 2.

*con-trib-ŷt-mēt, s. [Eng. contrive; -ment.]

1. A design, a plan, a plot.

(1) Board of Control: A board consisting of six members, established by Mr. Pitt, in 1784, for the control and legislation of India. It was abolished in 1858 on the transference of the government of India to the Crown.

The monopoly of Eastern trade granted to the old East India Company was designed simply for commercial purposes: the Government, in granting it a charter, had no conception that they were calling into existence what was ultimately to become one of the greatest military empires of the world. Nor was the Company itself aware of this: its intentions were pacific, but having to establish depôts of goods under the jurisdiction of native despots, who were accustomed, under some flimsy pretext, to help themselves to whatever in their dominions they coveted—subordinate despots following the evil example of their superiors—the agents of the Company, if they were not to be plundered wholesale, required to take some steps for their own defence. Beginning in a humble way and with reluctance to interfere for their interest in native politics, they soon found themselves in possession, first of detached territories, and ultimately of empire. When this unexpected state of things happened, it was deemed more needful than ever for the Home Government to keep a certain control over their proceedings, especially as the necessity for some of the numerous wars in which "the Company's forces" were engaged was not obvious in England. Hence the establishment of the Board of Control, which, gradually increasing its power at the expense of the Company, was often the real author of acts for which the Company were blamed. Thus the first Afghan war was forced upon the Company by the Board of Control with the sanction of the Cabinet, the Company protesting in vain against what was done. When the war was unsuccessful, and was held in other ways to have sullied the fair fame of Britain, the Company were then popularly held to have originated the hostilities commenced against their will. The mutinies and war of 1857 and 1858 having destroyed the Company's reputation and annihilated its power, the double government was abolished, the functions of the Board of Control were altered, and the Secretary of State for India, with the whole Cabinet, became the supreme government of India.

(2) Control Department of the British Army:

Mil.: Formerly a department of the British army which is now sub-divided into the Commissariat and Transport departments. The name was abolished by order on December, 11, 1875.

oön-väl-la-mär-ët-in, s. [Mod. Lat. convallaria (q.v.); Lat. amar(us) = bitter, and Gr. πικρῖν (phikrîne) = resin.]

Chem.: C<sub>20</sub>H<sub>36</sub>O<sub>8</sub>. A substance formed by the action of acids and alkalies on convallamarin. It forms crystalline spangles, which melt into a resinous mass.

oön-väl-la-mär-in, s. [Mod. Lat. convallaria (q.v.), and Lat. amarus = bitter.]

Chem.: C<sub>23</sub>H<sub>44</sub>O<sub>12</sub>. A bitter substance contained along with convallarin in Convallaria majalis. It is obtained by diluting and filtering the mother liquid from which the convallarin has separated, then digesting with animal charcoal, precipitating with tannic acid, and separating the tannic acid with oxide of lead. Convallamarin is a white bitter powder, easily soluble in water and in alcohol, nearly insoluble in ether. By heating the aqueous solution with dilute sulphuric acid the convallamarin is resolved into sugar, water, and convallamaretin. Nitric acid colours convallamarin yellow; strong sulphuric acid colours it violet.

oön-väl-lär-ët-in, s. [Mod. Lat. convallaria (q.v.), and Gr. πικρῖν (phikrîne) = resin.]

Chem.: C<sub>13</sub>H<sub>26</sub>O<sub>3</sub>. A yellowish-white crystalline substance, produced along with sugar, by boiling convallarin with dilute sulphuric acid.

oön-val-lär-lä, s. [Mod. Lat., from Class. Lat. convallis = a deep valley, a valley enclosed on all sides, in allusion to the place where the typical "Convallaria" grows.]

Botany:
Lily of the Valley: A genus of plants, order Lillaceæ, tribe Asparagææ. The only British species is Convallaria majalis, the sweetest Lily of the Valley. It has two ovate lanceolate radical leaves, a semi-cylindrical scape with racemes of very pure white fragrant flowers, with the divisions of the perianth recurved at the tips. The berries, which are globose, are red. It is found in woods and coppices, especially in a light soil, with some frequency in England, but is rarely indigenous at all in Scotland. [CONVAL.] There is a red-flowered and a double variety in gardens.

oön-väl-lär-in, s. [Mod. Lat. convallaria (q.v.); Eng. suff. -in.]

Chem.: C<sub>21</sub>H<sub>40</sub>O<sub>11</sub>. Obtained by collecting the plant Convallaria majalis during flowering time, and drying and pulverising it; it is then exhausted with alcohol, sp.gr. 0.84, the tincture precipitated by subacetate of lead, the lead removed from the filtrate by H<sub>2</sub>S gas, convallarin separating out on evaporation. It crystallises in colourless crystals, which are insoluble in ether, readily soluble in alcohol, and which have an irritating taste; the solution in water froths when agitated.

oön-va-nésce, v.t. [Lat. con = cum = together, with, and vanesco = to vanish.]

Math.: To disappear by running together, as the summits of solid angles (said of the edge of a polyhedron).

oön-va-nés-çi-ble, a. [Eng. convanescer; -ible.] That may, or does convanescer. The convanescible edge of a polyhedron is the edge that disappears when the two anmmita it joins run together.

*oon-veane, v. [CONVENE, v.]

oön-veot-ët, a. [Lat. convectus.] [CONVECTION.] Carried by convection.

oön-veo-tion, s. [Lat. convectio, from convectus, pr. par. of convexo = to carry.] [CONVEY.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The act or process of carrying or conveying from one place to another.

II. Nat. Phil.: The mode by which heat is propagated through liquids. This is by the portion heated becoming lighter than the rest, and ascending to the surface, a colder one descending to take its place. (Ganot.)

oön-veo-tive, a. [Lat. convectus (q.v.), and Eng. suff. -ive.] Arising from or caused by convection.

oön-veo-tive-lý, adv. [Eng. convective; -ly.] By means of convection; as heat communicated convectively.

*con-veen, s. [CONVENE.] A meeting, a convention.

"To bid him come to our convene."
W. Beattie: Tales, p. 6.

"You are convened this day..."
Longfellow: Evangeline, l. 4.

2. Legal: To summon to appear before a court.

"By the papal canon law, clerks, in criminal and civil causes, cannot be convened before any but an ecclesiastical judge."—Asiatic.

oön-véné, pr. par. or a. [CONVENE.]

*oön-vé-né, s. [Eng. conven(e); -e.] One who is convened or summoned to a meeting with others.

oön-vên-ër, s. [Eng. conven(e); -er.]

1. One who meets with others at any place for a particular business.

"I do reverence the conveners for their places, worth, and learning..."—Mountague: App. to Caesar, p. 74.

2. One who convenes or calls together a meeting.

3. Scot.: The chairman or president of a body or committee.

oön-ve-ni-ence, oön-ve-ni-çen-çy, s. [Lat. conventientia, from conveniens.] [CONVENTIENT.]

1. The state or quality of being convenient.

(1) Fitness, propriety, appropriateness.

"Conventiently, when a thing or action is so fitted to the circumstances, and the circumstances to it, that thereby it becomes a thing convenient."—Ferrius.

(2) Commodiousness, ease, freedom from difficulties.

"... it acts up all
That gives society its beauty, strength, Convenience, and security, and use."
Cowper: The Task, bk. II.

(3) Comfort, ease.

"Thus first necessarily invented stools, Convenience next suggested elbow chairs."
Cowper: The Task, bk. I.

(4) Accommodation.

"... he built a stately covered crose in the marketplace, for the glory of God, and conveniency of the poor people..."—Fuller: Worthies; London.

"When I have a convenient season I will call thee unto me."—Act. xiv. 28.

6. At hand, close by. (Colloquial.)

"Heretics used to be brought thither convenient for burning."—Thackeray, in Globe.

(1) Crabb thus discriminates between convenient and suitable: "Convenient regards the circumstances of the individual; suitable respects the established opinions of mankind, and is closely connected with moral propriety: nothing is convenient which does not favour one's purpose; nothing is suitable which does not suit the person, place, and thing: whoever has anything to ask of another must take a convenient opportunity in order to ensure success; his address on such an occasion would be very unsuitable, if he affected to claim as a right what he ought to solicit as a favour." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between convenient and commodious, see COMMODIOUS.

côn-vê-ni-ent-ly, adv. [Eng. convenient; -ly.]

- 1. Fitly, suitably, appropriately.
- 2. With proper arrangement or adaptation.
- 3. Commodiously, with ease, without trouble or discomfort.

C. As substantive:

- 1. The act of coming together to a meeting.
  - 2. The act of summoning or calling together.
- "No man was better pleased with the convening of this parliament than myself."—King Charles.

côn-vent, *co-vent, s. & a. [Mod. Fr. convent; O. Fr. covent; Prov. covent, conven, coven = accord, convention; covent, coven = a convent, an assembly; Sp., Port., & Ital. convento, all from Lat. conventus = a coming together; an assembly of Roman citizens in the provinces, where the governor administered justice and transacted other business.]

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

- *1. Gen.: A coming together, a meeting.
- "A usual ceremony at their convents or meetings."—Ben Jonson.
- 2. In the same sense as II. 1.
- 3. In the same sense as II. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Ecclesiology:

(1) The fraternity or sisterhood of an abbey or priory; a community of religious persons, whether monks or nuns. At first those who withdrew to the desert lived solitarily [EREMITES]; the gathering together into a community of all those solitaries who could be brought to tolerate the restraint of a society regulated by rule was a later movement. [CONVENT.]

"Lodged in the abbey; where the reverend abbot, With all his convent, honourably received him."—Shakesp.: Henry VIII. iv. 2.

(2) The house in which the community described under (1) dwells; a monastery or a nunnery.

"... von monastales hie die little convent of Sallet Bride."
Scott: The Lord of the Isles, iv. 18.

2. Hist.: It is said that the first convent in England was erected by Eadbald at Folkestone in 630, and the first in Scotland at Coldingham in 670. They were numerous during the Middle Ages. Henry VIII. suppressed them, confiscating their revenues. By the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829 their erection in the United Kingdom was prohibited, but the Act was from the first so much of a dead letter that they were established in various places with no protest from the community in general. For a long time convents in Britain were founded by the Church of Rome only, but in 1876 one was opened at Bournemouth under the auspices of the Ritualist party in the Establishment. They exist somewhat widely in the United States and have, on more than one occasion, been attacked by mobs, but are ordinarily undisturbed.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to a convent, especially in the sense of A. II. 1 (2).

¶ The obsolete form Covent still lingers in the name Covent Garden. (See etym.)

¶ For the difference between convent and cloister, see CLOISTER.

"The gardener . . . had mortgaged a mouth of his conventical wages."—Stearns: First Sunday, v. 118.

côn-vên-ti-cle, s. & a. [Fr. conventicule; Sp. & Port. conventiculo; Ital. conventicolo, all from Lat. conventiculum = a small assembly, from conventus.] [CONVENT, a.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

- †1. Gen.: A small gathering, an assembly (with or without contempt).

"They are commanded to abstain from all conventicles of men whatever."—Agitator.

2. Spec.: A small gathering for religious worship. The word was applied to the schools of Wycliffe. Afterwards it was used of Dissenters from the Establishment in Queen Elizabeth's time, but it did not come into great prominence till the passing of the Uniformity Act in 1662. Then Conventicles was employed as a term of contempt for the gatherings of Nonconformists in England and of Covenanters in Scotland, who remained in separation from the established Churches of their respective countries. [CONVENTICLE ACT.]

"... to leave unrevoked the Act which made it death to attend a Presbyterian conventicle."—Maccuslay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

¶ Conventicle acts:

Law & Hist.: Various Acts designed to punish those who conducted or frequented conventicles. By 35 Eliz., c. 1, passed in 1593, any persons attending such places were to be imprisoned till they conformed. If they did not conform within three months they were to abjure the realm, and if they would not do this, or if after abjuration they returned to the country again, they were to be hanged. By the Conventicle Act, 16 Chas. II., c. 4, passed in 1664, it was enacted that whenever five persons more than the inmates of the house where a conventicle was held attended it, every one of them was liable to a penalty of £5 or three months' imprisonment for the first offence, twice as much for the second, and a fine of £100 or transportation for seven years for the third. The penalties were modified by the 22 Chas. II., c. 1, passed in 1670, and the Act itself repealed by the Toleration Act, 1 Will. & Mary, c. 18, § 1, passed May 24, 1689. Similar enactments were in force in Scotland at the same period. (Townsend, &c.) côn-vên-ti-clêr, s. [Eng. conventicler; -er.] A supporter or frequenter of conventicles.

*côn-vên-ti-cle, v. t. [From conventicle, s. (q.v.).] To partake of the nature of a conventicle; to be connected with a conventicle.

*côn-vên-ti-clîng, a. [Eng. conventicler; -ing.] Belonging to or partaking of the nature of a conventicle.

"... private, hided, conventicling schools . . ."—Baugh: Sermons, v. 48.

côn-vên-tîng, pr. par., a., & s. [CONVENT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of meeting or of summoning together to a meeting.

"... the convening together of this council . . ."—State Trials; The Conclusion of John Wickliffe côn-vên-tion, s. & a. [Fr. convention; Prov. & Sp. convencion; Port. convencio; Ital. convenzione, all from Lat. conventio (genit. conventionis) = (1) an assembly, a meeting, (2) an agreement, a compact, from conventus, pa. par. of convenio.] [CONVENE.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

- 1. The act of coming together or assembling; the state of being assembled.
- 2. Those who there meet.

"A convention of socialists which proclaims all property to be robbery."—Maccuslay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

3. The act of coming together under the operation of natural law; the state of being brought together.

"The conventions, or associations, of several particles of matter into bodies of any certain denomination."—Boyle.

4. A formal engagement between two or more powers, parties, or individuals.

5. General agreement; tacit consent.

"A useful convention . . . restricted the use of these phonographs."—J. Taylor: Alphabet, l. 65.

6. A rule or collection of rules based on common consent.

II. Technically:

1. History and Law: The assemblage of Conventions has been very common in the history of the United States, alike on great and on small occasions. They were frequently called during the disturbances in public feeling which preceded the Revolutionary War. Of later conventions the most important was that which formed the Constitution of the United States. Following its example, the Constitutions of the several states have been similarly formed in conventions, and they have been called on various other occasions, as in the Southern States in the period preceding the Civil War.

In Great Britain there have been Parliamentary Conventions during times of national crisis or revolution, assembled without waiting for the royal writ or sanction. Such a convention has assumed powers beyond those of an ordinary Parliament, throwing aside precedent, and reconstructing or modifying the political machinery. Such a convention was that called by General Monk, which restored Charles II. to the throne; also that which bestowed the throne of England on William of Orange.

2. French Hist.: The term applied to what was more fully named The National Convention, which succeeded the National Legislative Assembly on September 21, 1792, and was dissolved October 26, 1795. It commenced by abolishing royalty and proclaiming a republic, it altered the calendar, was sanguinary in its measures, and was at feud with Europe.

3. Diplomacy, Hist., &c.: An agreement previous to the conclusion of a treaty. Thus there have been conventions with America, France, &c., about the extradition of fugitives from justice.

4. Mil.: A treaty or engagement entered into by the commanders of two armies opposed to each other in a campaign, as to the terms on which a truce or temporary cessation of hostilities may be made between them.

B. As adj.: Partaking of the nature of such a convention as that described under A. II. 1.

convention-parliament, convention-parliament, s. A parliament which is transformed into a convention, or vice versa.

"... the convention-parliament which restored King Charles the Second . . ."—Blackstone's Comment., bk. I, ch. ii.

côn-vên-tion-al, a. [Eng. convention; -al.]

I. Ordinary Language:

- *1. Agreed on by compact, or under certain conditions and stipulations.
- 2. Arising from or founded on custom or use, and sanctioned by general agreement or concurrence.

"Poetry and elocution of every sort make use of signs, but those signs are arbitrary and conventional."—Sir J. Reynolds, Disc. 10.

II. Technically:

1. Fine Arts: Depending on, or following tradition and accepted models, irrespective of the true principles of art.

"[Christian painting] was rigidly traditional, conventional, hierarchical."—Milman: Lat. Christ., bk. xiv., ch. x.

* 2. Old Law: Depending on or arising from the mutual agreement of the several parties.

"Conventional services reserved by tenures upon grants, made out of the crown or knights' service."—Hale: Common Law.

¶ (1) Conventional estates: Those freeholds, not of inheritance, or estates for life, which are created by the express acts of the parties, in contradistinction to those which are legal, and arise from the operation and construction of law. (Blackstone & Wharton.)

(2) Conventional obligations: Obligations arising from the special agreement of the parties, in contradistinction to natural or legal obligations.

côn-vên-tion-âl-î-am, s. [Eng. conventional; -ism.]

1. Any conventional character, system, form, or ceremony; anything depending upon conventional rules and precedents.

"... strengthening conventionalism into irresistible law."—Milton: Latin Christianity, bk. xiv., ch. x.

"The oldest of whom had never seen a conventual garb."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

B. As subst.: A member of a convent or monastery; a monk, a nun; one of the Conventual brethren, ¶ (1).

"And some questions hath arise in the order of Saint Francis, between the observantes and y<sup>e</sup> conventuales."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 875.

¶ (1) Conventual Brethren:

Ch. Hist.: A large section of the Franciscan Order, consisting of all laxer members who consented, upon the permission of the pontiffs, somewhat to modify the severe discipline of the founder. The other sections were called the Brethren of the Observation, or the Regular Observantines. They were much more strict. In 1308 they were permitted by the general of their order to separate from the Conventual Brethren and form a distinct organization. (Mosheim: Ch. Hist., cent. xiv., pt. ii., ch. ii., § 34.)

(2) Conventual church: A church attached to or belonging to a convent or monastery.

"Of vast cathedral or conventual church, Their vigils kept."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

Conventual mass: The mass said daily for the community of a religious house, all the members of which are bound to be present at the celebration.

côn-vêr-gê, v. t. & i. [Fr. & Sp. converger; Port. convergir, from Low Lat. convergo: Class. Lat. con = together, and vergo = 1. (i.) to cause to turn, to incline; 2. (i.) to incline or be inclined.]

†A. Trans.: To cause to appear from different directions, and, if continued sufficiently far, to meet.

"Placing a concave silvered mirror behind the electric light I converge its rays to a focus of dazzling brilliancy."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd. ed.), ix. 232.

B. Intransitive:

1. Of things material: To approach, and, if continued sufficiently far, to meet.

"Encompassing first The lower skies, they all at once converge High to the crown of heaven."—Thomson: Autumn.

2. Of things immaterial: To approach.

"... subsequently, as suggested by Vogt, they converged in character."—Darwin: The Descent of Man (1871), pt. I, ch. vii., vol. I, p. 230.

"... the convergence or divergence of the rays..."—Berkeley: New Theory of Vision, § 55.

côn-vêr-gênt, a. [Fr. convergent; Sp., Port., & Ital. convergente, all from Low Lat. convergens (genit. convergentis), pr. par. of convergo.] [CONVERGENT.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Tending towards a point; tending to approach each other. (Used of things material or immaterial.)

"... directing its convergent curves to heaven."—Hallam: Lit. of Europe, pt. I, ch. iii., § 69.

II. Technically:

1. Alg. & Arith.: A term applied to certain series of terms or numbers. A convergent series of terms or of numbers is one which, continued ever so far, will not amount to a certain given number. If 3 be the given number, then such a series as 3 + 1/4 + 1/16 + 1/64 + 1/256, is convergent, for all the fractions together will never amount to 3. It is opposed to a divergent series of terms or numbers, which being infinitely continued will sooner or later amount to the given number. [DIVERGENT.]

2. Optics, &c.: A term used specially (1) of most rays of light which, being continued, will meet in a focus; (2) of a lens which will make the rays thus meet in a focus.

côn-vêr-gên-ti, in compos. [From Low Lat. convergens (genit. convergentis) = converging.]

Bot.: A term used only in the subjoined compound.

convergenti-nervosus, a. [Mod. Lat. convergenti-nervosus.]

"Let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel."—Phil. I. 27.

7. The act of conversing; familiar or intimate talk.

"What I mentioned some time ago in conversation, was not a new thought."—Sieff.

8. The subject on which persons converse.

* 9. A conversazione.

"Lady Pomfret had a charming conversation once a week."—Walpole: Lett., i. 171. (Davies.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between conversation, dialogus, colloquy, and conference:

"A conversation is always something actually held between two persons; a dialogue is mostly fictitious, and written as if spoken; any number of persons may take part in a conversation; but a dialogue always refers to the two persons who are expressly engaged: a conversation may be deautory, in which each takes his part at pleasure; a dialogue is formal, in which there will always be reply and rejoinder: a conversation may be carried on by any signs besides words, which are addressed personally to the individual present; a dialogue must always consist of express words: a prince holds frequent conversations with his ministers on affairs of state; Cicero wrote dialogues on the nature of the gods, and many later writers have adopted the dialogue form as a vehicle for conveying their sentiments: a conference is a species of conversation; a colloquy is a species of dialogue; a conversation is indefinite as to the subject, or the parties engaged in it; a conference is confined to particular subjects and descriptions of persons; a conversation is mostly occasional: a conference is always specifically appointed: a conversation is mostly on indifferent matters; a conference is mostly on national or public concerns: we have a conversation as friends: we have a conference as ministers of state. (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

conversation-tube, s. A speaking-tube (q. v.).

côn-vër-sä'-tion-al, a. [Eng. conversation; -al.] Pertaining or relating to conversation; done in conversation.

 "His lectures of repartee, converse, regales, and a hundred more unimitable toperies." —The Reformation (1673).

côn-verse (2), a. & s. [Lat. conversus, pa. par. of converti = to turn about: con = cum = with, fully, and verso = to turn.]

A. As adj.: Turned round, opposite.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. One who has been converted, a convert.
 "He commauded that alle conversis for hetheness to the lawe of Israel schulden be gderid." —Wycliffe: Paralyt., xxii. 2. (Purseye).
 2. The opposite; the counterpart, the complement; the reverse, the contrary.

"It is not true (says he) but the converse of the proposition is true in the utmost latitude, ..." —Hurburton: Dis. Leg., pref. to ed. of 1718.

II. Technically:

1. Geom.: (See abstract).
 "A proposition is said to be the converse of another, when, after drawing a conclusion from something first proposed, we proceed to suppose what had been before concluded, and to draw from it what had been supposed. Thus, if two sides of a triangle be equal, the angles opposite to those sides are also equal: the converse of the proposition is, that if two angles of a triangle be equal, the sides opposite to those angles are also equal." —Chambers.

2. Logic: A proposition that has been converted. [CONVERSION, ¶ 5.]

"The truth of any proposition implies that of its illative converse." —Whately: Elem. of Logic, bk. ii, ch. iii, ¶ 5.

* côn-versed, a. [Eng. convers(e); -ed.] Turned back, reversed.

côn-vers-ër, s. [Eng. convers(e); -er.] One who converses; a talker.

côn-vers-ÿ-ble, a. [Eng. convers(e); -able.] Capable of being converted or made converse.

¶ For the difference between conversible and facetious, see FACETIOUS.

côn-vers-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CONVERSE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

1. Intercourse, dealing, association, or familiarity.
 "... all our conversings with others, ..." —Dr. H. More: Whole Duty of Man, § 16.

2. Conversation, talk.

côn-verse-sion, *con-verse-syon, s. [Fr. & Sp. conversion; Ital. conversione; Lat. conversio = a turning round, from conversus, pa. par. of converti.] [CONVERSE, a.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. The act of turning or changing from one state into another; transmutation, change.
 "Artificial conversion of water into ice, ..." —Bacon.

2. The state of being turned or changed from one state into another; change of function.
 "In considering transitions of organs, it is so important to bear in mind the probability of conversion from one function to another, ..." —Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. vi, p. 191.

II. Figuratively:

1. The act of changing or turning from one mode of life, religion, or belief to another. [B. 5.]

2. The state or condition of being changed or turned from one mode of life or religion to another.

B. Technically:

1. Law: The act of appropriating to private use, as in trover and conversion.
 "Or bring my action of conversion
 And trover for my goods." —Butler: Sudbras, III. 2.

2. Ship-building:

(1) The change of a vessel from one class to another by a reduction in size, alteration of rig, &c.

(2) The cutting—usually with the saw—of logs of timber into pieces nearly of this shape required.

3. Logic: The process by which the converse of a proposition is obtained.
 "Conversion is the changing or altering of words in a proposition, ..." —Wilson: The Arts of Logike, vol. 21.

4. Military:

(1) A change of front.

(2) The alteration of a muzzle-loading gun or rifle to breech-loading.

5. Scip. & Theol.: The word conversion occurs only once in the Bible, but portions of the verb to convert occur eleven times, and the substantive convert once. Conversion is the rendering of the Greek word ἐπιστροφή (epistrophê) = literally (1) a turning about, (2) a turning towards. Converso in Latin, and conversion in English, are the exactly correspondent words in those languages. The meaning is that a large number of the Gentiles had "turned about" so as to leave behind them their belief in the imaginary divinities of their countrymen and direct their faces towards Christianity, a spiritual and moral renovation attending their change of belief. The verb to convert is used of a change wrought upon a sinner's heart when he was turned from his sins to God without any change in his nominal religious professions; before and after his change of heart he remained an avowed adherent of Judaism (Psalm ii. 13). Of such a change of heart the "law of the Lord" is an instrument or means (Psalm xix.), or the instrumentality may be human (James v. 19, 20). The change is attended by repentance and forgiveness (Acts ii. 19). It makes the character child-like, and none but those who have undergone this change shall enter the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xviii. 3). There are anonymous words of the same meaning; as, for instance, turn in Jer. xxxi. 18, where, for the production of the spiritual change described, the intervention of the Divine Being is considered to be needful, and is sought in prayer (Jer. xxxi. 18). This is the continual teaching of the New Testament (John vi. 44, xvi. 7-11; Acts ii. 26). Many theologians call the Divinely-produced spiritual change now indicated conversion. The 17th Article of the Church of England, while not using the term, clearly describes the idea embodied under it in the following words:—"Wherefore they which be ended with so excellent a benefit of God be called according to God's purpose by his Spirit working in due season; they through Grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made the Sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ: they walk religiously in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity." The teaching of the Westminster Confession of Faith is conveyed in less concise language, but the meaning is in all respects the same. And with these the teachings of most Protestant confessions agree.

¶ (1) By conversion: [Lat. convertendo].
Math.: A term used when, there being four proportionals, it is inferred that the first is to its excess above the second as the third to its excess above the fourth.

(2) Centre of conversion:

Mech.: The point in a body about which it turns as a centre when a force is applied to any part of it, or unequal forces to its different parts. (Ogilvie.)

(3) Conversion of equations:

Alg.: The reducing of a fractional equation into an integral one.

* 2. Eccles.: A lay member of a religious order; one who has turned from the world to religion in adult life, as distinguished from those brought up from childhood in a religious house.

* B. As adj.: Converted to the true religion.

"... circumcising the convert Gentiles."—Locke: Galatians, ch. II, note 2.

† Crabb thus discriminating between convert and proselyte: "Convert is more extensive in its aena and application than proselyte: convert in its full sense includes every change of opinion, without respect to the subject; proselyte in its strict sense refers only to changes from one religion to another. . . . Conversion is a more voluntary act than proselytism; it emanates entirely from the mind of the agent, independent of foreign influence; it extends not merely to the abstract or speculative opinions of the individual, but to the whole current of his feelings and spring of his actions: it is the conversion of the heart and soul. Proselytism is an outward act, which need not extend beyond the conformity of one's words and actions to a certain rule: convert is therefore always taken in a good sense; it bears on the face of it the stamp of sincerity: proselyte is a term of more ambiguous meaning; the proselyte is often the creature and tool of a party; there may be many proselytes where there are no converts." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōn-vērt-ēd, a. [CONVERT, v.]

3. Theol.: The same as CONVERSION, B. 6 (q.v.).

converting-furnace, s. A furnace for converting wrought-iron into steel. The process is as follows: The bars of iron are cut by shears to the required length and are placed in layers in a flat, narrow furnace, with intervening layers of pounded charcoal. Above the alternate strata of iron and charcoal is a covering of ferruginous earth. The mass being heated, the carbon is in some way absorbed by the iron, which is converted into steel. This is known as CEMENTATION (q.v.). The resulting blister steel, so called from the blisters formed by bubbles of gas which were eliminated during the process of conversion, is then cut up, reheated and hammered, and becomes shear steel. Blister steel, cut up, heated in crucibles, poured into moulds, and the ingots hammered into shape, becomes cast-steel. (Knight.)

* cōn-vērt-īst, s. [Eog. convert; -ist.] A convert.

6. A strong belief or persuasion resting on what appears to be indisputable grounds.

"And did you presently fall under the power of this conviction?" Bunyan: P. P., pt. 1.

Crabb thus distinguishes between conviction and persuasion: "What convinces blinds; what persuades attracts. We convince by arguments; it is the understanding which determines; we are persuaded by entreaties and personal influence; it is the imagination or will which decides. Our conviction respects solely matters of belief or faith; our persuasion respects matters of belief or practice; we are convinced that a thing is true or false; we are persuaded that it is either right or wrong, advantageous or the contrary. A person will have half effected a thing who is convinced that it is in his power to effect it; he will be easily persuaded to do that which favours his own interests. Conviction respects our most important duties; persuasion is applied to matters of indifference. The first step to true repentance is a thorough conviction of the enormity of sin." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

†convict-ism, s. [Eng. convict; -ism.] The convict system; the system of transportation of convicts to penal settlements.

convinc-tious, a. [CONVICIOUS.] conviv-ial, a. & s. [Lat. convivialis.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a feast, festive, convivial. [CONVIVE.] "The same was a convivial dish."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. xxv.

B. As subst.: A guest. (Sandys: Travels, p. 78.) (Davies.)

convive, v.t. [Lat. convivio = (1) to live together, (2) to feast together: con = cum = with, together, and vivo = to live.] To feast together, to be convivial. (Shakspeare: Troilus & Cressida, iv. 5.)

convive, a. [Lat. conviva = a guest.] A guest at a banquet. "The ravished convives' tongues it courted." Beaumont: Psyche, c. x., § 211.

conviv-ial, a. [Lat. convivialis, from convivium = a banquet.]

1. Of things: Relating or pertaining to a feast, festive, social. "Which feasts, convivial meetings we did name." Insham.

2. Of persons: Jovial, merry. "Your social and convivial spirit..."—Dr. Newton.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between convivial and social: "The prominent idea in convivial is that of sensual indulgence; the prominent idea in social is that of enjoyment from an intercourse with society. Convivial is a species of the social; it is the social in matters of festivity. What is convivial is social, but what is social is something more; the former is excelled by the latter as much as the body is excelled by the mind. We speak of convivial meetings, convivial enjoyments or the convivial board; but social intercourse, social pleasure, social amusements, and the like." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

conviv-ial-ist, s. [Eng. convivial; -ist.] A person of convivial habits or disposition.

conviv-ial-ity, s. [Formed as if from a Lat. convivialis, from convivialis.]

1. A disposition to convivial habits. "... he sacrificed too much to conviviality..."—Cooper: The Cock-fighter's Garland.

2. The mirth or merriment indulged in at convivial gatherings. "These extemporaneous entertainments were often productive of greater conviviality."—Malone: Life of Sir J. Reynolds, p. 51.

conviv-iate, v.t. [From Lat. convivium, the supper of convoco = to convoke, to call together: con = together, and voco = to call.] To call together, to assemble.

"That authority, which... did at that time convocate councils."—Taylor: Liberty of Prophecy, § 4.

convoc-ation, s. [Fr. convocation; Prov. convocat; Sp. convocacion; Port. convocação; Ital. convocazione, all from Lat. convocatio (genit. convocationis) = a calling together.] [CONVOKE.]

I. Ordinary Language: 1. The act of calling together, the state of being called together.

2. That which is called together, a meeting, an assembly.

(1) Lit. (Of persons): "... societies, lodges, convocations, and meetings without number."—Goldsmith: Essays, 1.

(2) Fig. (Of the inferior animals, or any thing): "Not where he eats, but where he is eaten: a certain convocation of politic worms are e'en at him."—Shakspeare: Hamlet, iv. 4.

II. Technically: 1. Jewish archcol: A stated festival or any other day on which the people were divinely annointed together. On those days, as a rule, no servile work was done.

"... concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations..."—Lev. xxiii. 2.

2. Eccles.: An assembly of the clergy. Specially the name given to either of two such gatherings, the one termed the Convocation of Canterbury, or simply Convocation, the other the Convocation of York. The Convocation in the 16th century having recognised that the king's majesty justly and rightfully is and ought to be the supreme earthly head of the Church of England, the king in that capacity has the prerogative of calling convocation together, which is done at the commencement of each session of Parliament. To a certain extent, the Convocation of Canterbury is itself framed on the Parliamentary model. It has two Houses, the Upper one (representing the Lords), consisting solely of bishops presided over by the archbishop; the Lower one, the deans, the archdeacons, and proctors (the last-named officers being designed to represent the inferior clergy, and to present an analogy to the House of Commons). The Convocation of York less closely resembles Parliament, for it has only a single house. In mediæval times, Convocation was a much greater power than now. When the clergy of all degrees managed to exempt themselves from the general taxation of the country levied in the ordinary way, Convocation was required to assess the clerical body for the expenses of the civil government, and some have contended that this was originally its only function. Others, however, have been assigned to it, especially the enactment of canon law, and the examination and censure of heretical books or individuals. By 25 Henry VIII., c. 19, Convocation was prohibited from making any canon or ordinance which was opposed to the king's prerogative, or to the laws, customs, and statutes of the realm. By 16 & 17 Charles II., c. 1, passed in 1685, the clergy as well as the laity were required to pay their quota of taxes together, and the former were discharged from all obligation regarding the subsidies levied by Convocation. In 1716, the remaining privileges were taken away, and for a long time afterwards it remained almost in a state of suspended animation, being no sooner called together at the commencement of each session of Parliament than it was prorogued before it could do any business. In 1854, an effort began to revive Convocation and give it real power of dealing with ecclesiastical matters, but both parties in Parliament are opposed to such a revolution. However, in February, 1872, they allowed the clergy to deliberate on alterations in the liturgy, and embodied them in an Act on 5th of March of the same year.

3. Tin-mining: The same as CONVOCATORS (q.v.).

convoc-ation-al, a. [Eng. convocation; -al.] Pertaining to a convocation in general, or in particular to the ecclesiastical synod so designated. [CONVOCAATION, II. 2.]

convoc-ation-ist, s. [Eng. convocation; -ist.] One who supports convocation; an advocate for the revival of the powers of Convocation.

convoc-ation-tory, s. pl. [Lat.] The parliament of tilters. All Statutory laws are enacted by the several convocations. (Wade.)

convoc-ate, v.t. [Fr. convoquer; Prov., Sp., & Port. convocar; Ital. convocare, from Lat. convocare = to call together, to summon: con = cum = together, and voco = to call, to invite.] To call or summon together, to assemble. Used—

1. Lit. (Of persons): "Write convocating a Parliament."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., xii.

2. Fig. (Of things): (Wordsworth: Excursion.)

ból, bóy; pót, jóv!; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -Ing, -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -sious, -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl.

¶ To convolve is to call together by authority, to summon; to invite is simply to request.

cón-vòked, pa. par. & a. [CONVOKE, v.]

cón-vò-king, pr. par. & a. [CONVOKE, v.]

cón-vò-lúte, cón-vò-lú-téd, a. & s. [Lat. convolutus, pa. par. of convolve = to roll together, to roll round.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Rolled together, rolled round.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. (Of petals, leaves, &c.): Wholly rolled up in another of the same kind. [CONVOLUTE.]

2. Zool.: In the same sense. (Used of bones, membranes, &c.)

¶ Convolute vernation:

Bot.: Vernation in which one margin is rolled up towards the midrib, as in grasses and bananas.

B. As subst.: That which is rolled up, as in a ball. (De Quincy: System of the Heavens.)

cón-vò-lú-tion, s. [From Lat. convolutus, pa. par. of convolve.] [CONVOLVE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of rolling anything upon itself or round; the state of being so rolled.

"O'er the calm sky, in convolution swift,
The feather'd eddy floats."

Thomson: Autumn.

2. The twists or folds of anything rolled about itself or round.

II. Anat. (Pl.): Numerous smooth and tortuous eminences on the surface of the cerebral hemispheres, marked off from each other by deep furrows. The former are sometimes called gyri, and the latter are named anfractuosités or sulci. As a rule the depth of a convolution exceeds its thickness. The dividing fissures are about half an inch deep. Each has received a name; thus there are the angular, the marginal, the supra-marginal, the hippocampal, and various other convolutions.

"Their skulls are smaller, and the convolutions of the brain are less complex than in normal men."—Burns: Descent of Man (1871), pt. I, ch. iv., vol. I, p. 121.

cón-vò-lú-tive, o. [Mod. Lat. convolutivus.] Bot.: The same as CONVOLUTE (q.v.).

cón-volve, v.t. [From Lat. convolve = to roll together; con = together, and volve = to roll.] To roll together.

"Huge trunks; and each particular trunk a growth of interwisted fibres serpentine Upcoiling, and inveterately convolved."

cón-volved, pa. par. & a. [CONVOLVE.]

cón-volv-ing, pr. par. & a. [CONVOLVE.]

cón-volv-ù-lá-gè-sè, s. pl. [Lat. convolutulus (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: An order of perigynous exogens, placed by Lindley in his silianæ Solanales. The species are generally twining and milky plants, though some are erect bushes. The leaves are often undivided. There are no stipules. Inflorescence axillary or terminal; the partial peduncles, when any exist, generally in the form of two bracts. Corolla, monopetalous, deciduous; the limb five-lobed, plaited; stamens five; ovary simple, with two or four cells, rarely with one; ovules few, erect; style one, generally divided at the top into as many segments as the cells of the ovary; capsule one to four celled, succulent or capsular. Very common in all parts of the tropics, rarer in cold countries. The roots abound in a milky juice, which is strongly purgative. It is the active principle in Jalap (Convolvulus Jalapa), Scammony (C. Scammonia), &c. [CONVOLVULUS, JALAP, SCAMMONY. Batatas edulis is the Sweet Potato. [BATATAS.] There are two tribes or sections of the order: Convolvulæ, with the carpels consolidated, and Dichondræ, with them distinct. There are forty-six genera known and nearly 700 species. Two British genera, Convolvulus and Calystegia (q.v.); species three.

cón-volv-ù-lá-cè-ous, a. [Mod. Lat. convolutulacæ (q.v.), and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Pertaining to the order Convolvulacæ, and especially to its typical genus Convolvulus.

cón-volv-ù-lic, a. [Lat. convoluticus (q.v.), and Eng. suff. -ic.]

convolvulic acid, s.

Chem.: C<sub>21</sub>H<sub>24</sub>O<sub>12</sub>. An organic acid obtained by boiling convolvulin with baryta water, then precipitating the excess of baryta with dilute sulphuric acid, removing the excess of sulphuric acid by lead carbonate, and finally removing the lead by H<sub>2</sub>S gas. Convolvulic acid is a white amorphous bitter powder, readily soluble in water and in alcohol, insoluble in ether. Its aqueous solution is acid, and it forms salts called convolvulates. By boiling with dilute sulphuric acid, it yields sugar and convolvulinol. It is also called rhodoretic acid.

cón-volv-ù-lin, s. [Lat. convolutus (us), and Eng. suff. -in (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: C<sub>31</sub>H<sub>50</sub>O<sub>16</sub>. Also called rhodoretin. A colourless transparent resin contained in the rhizome of the officinal jalap root. Convolvulin is prepared by exhausting the root of Convolvulus orizabensis with boiling water, then drying and pulverising it, and treating it with twice its weight of ninety per cent. alcohol, mixing the alcoholic extract with water till it begins to show turbidity; then treating the liquid twice with animal charcoal, distilling the alcohol from the filtrate, repeatedly treating the residual pulverised resin (amounting to between ten and fifteen per cent. of the root) with ether; dissolving the residue in the smallest possible quantity of absolute alcohol, and precipitating with ether till the precipitate is quite free from resin soluble in ether. The residue is pure convolvulin. Convolvulin is tasteless and inodorous, nearly insoluble in water. When dry it melts at 150°, forming a yellow transparent liquid; it burns with a smoky flame. Finely divided convolvulin dissolves in aqueous alkalies, and is converted into convolvulinic acid. When dissolved in alcohol it is decomposed by hydrochloric acid, yielding convolvulinol and glucose. It dissolves in strong sulphuric acid, forming a carmine colour, which afterwards turns brown and deposits a dark brown substance. Convolvulin is the active principle of jalap-resin. It exerts a very strong purgative action even in doses of a few grains. (Watts: Dict. Chem., vol. II., p. 15.)

cón-volv-ù-lin-ól, s. [Eng. convolutin, and Lat. oleum (s).]

Chem.: Convolvulinic acid, rhoderetinol (C<sub>13</sub>H<sub>24</sub>O<sub>8</sub>)<sub>2</sub> + H<sub>2</sub>O. Obtained by the action of dilute acids or of emulsion on convolvulic acid. It forms white inodorous needle crystals, which have a biting bitter taste, slightly soluble in water, readily soluble in alcohol; it melts at 39°. It volatilises when heated on platinum foil; the vapours cause coughing. It is oxidised by concentrated nitric acid into oxalic and ipomeic acids. Strong sulphuric acid colours it first yellow, then ananrath-red. It dissolves in alkalies, and parts with water, becoming C<sub>13</sub>H<sub>24</sub>O<sub>8</sub>, which is considered to be the true acid; it melts at 42°. It forms salts, called convolvulinolates.

cón-volv-ù-lin-ól-ic, a. [Lat. convoluticus, suff. -in (? Chem.), in combination with Eng. oleic, from Lat. oleum = oil (?).]

Chem.: A term used only in the subjoined compound.

convolvulinolic acid, s.

Chem.: A chemical substance obtained by the action of acids or alkalies on resinous glucosides contained in the root of Jalap, Convolvulus Schiedanus, and of C. orizabensis.

cón-volv-ù-lüs (pl. convolvulüs), s. [Lat. = (1) a caterpillar which rolls itself up in a leaf, (2) the Bindweed, Spec. Convolvulus sepium.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Convolvulacæ and the tribe Convolvulæ. The calyx is without bracts, the corolla funnel-shaped, the capsule two-celled, each cell with two seeds. There are two British species. One is Convolvulus arvensis: it has a root running deeply into the ground, rendering the plant difficult of extirpation; sagittate leaves, with acute lobes; the peduncles usually single-flowered, with minute bracts distant from the flowers, which are somewhat small and pale rose-coloured. It is common in fields and hedges, especially where the soil is light. The other is C. Soldanella, the Sea-side Convolvulus or Bindweed. It has reniform fleshy leaves, and large rose-coloured flowers. It has been sometimes placed in the genus Calystegia. The British species are purgative; so also is the foreign C. macrocarpa. C. dissecta abounds in prussic acid, and is one of the plants used in the preparation of the liquor called noyau.

cón-vøy, *con-vey, v.t. [A doublet of convey (q.v.). Fr. convoyer; Ital. convogliare; Sp. convoyar.]

1. To accompany on a journey by land or sea for the sake of defence or safety; to escort.

"That through the fear of the Algerines, Convoys those lazy brigantines."

Longfellow: The Golden Legend, v.

2. To accompany, to attend.

"Whilist angels him convoy and saints attend,"
Stirling: Doomsday.

* 3. To convey, impart, or communicate.

"In conveying this truth of my understanding,"—Milton: Church Government.

* 4. To accomplish, to manage, especially by artful means. (Scotch.)

cón-vøy, s. & a. [CONVOY, v.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of conveying or escorting on a journey.

"He would give order to fetch the silver with good and safe convoy."—Buckingt: Voyages, vol. II., pt. II., p. 161.

2. The act of attending on or accompanying.

"Your convoy makes the dangerous way secure."
Dryden: Aurengzebe.

3. A protecting force accompanying or escorting any person or persons, goods, ships, &c., for purposes of defence; an escort, a guard. [II. 1, 2.]

"... the men of war which formed the convoy."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

* 4. The company at a wedding that goes to meet the bride. (Scotch.)

5. The person or persons, goods, &c., convoyed; used also to signify the whole force, including the protected as well as the protectors.

6. Guidance, conduct.

"They deemed it hopeless to avoid The convoy of their dangerous guide."
Scott: Marmion, v. 14.

* 7. The act of conveying or transporting anything; conveyance, carriage.

"... his passport shall be made And crowns for convoy put into his purse."
Shakspeare: Hen. I., iv. 2.

* 8. A channel or means of conveyance.

"... not knowing the convoy of it..."—Batille: Lett. I. 427.

* 9. Conduct, mien, behaviour, carriage.

"Quhen I saw hir as trimlye dance;
Hir good convoy and contentance."
Dunbar: Maitland Poems, p. 66.

* 10. Artful or prudent management; finesse.

"Then the earle Douglas, be whols moyane and convoy
All the court was guidit,..."—Pittscottie: Convoy, p. 49.

* 11. A trick, a cheat, a juggle.

"Bot how, alas, as ye shall heir, Betrayed thame bairn with a tryne convoy."
Sp. St. Androis: Poems (16 cent.), p. 811.

¶ A Scots convoy: Accompanying one to the door, or "o'er the doortane."

II. Technically:

1. Naut.: Ships of war sent to accompany merchantmen in time of war, and, if possible, prevent them from being captured or sunk by the enemy.

2. Mil.: A body of troops accompanying ammunition, provisions, or other valuable liable to be captured by the enemy.

3. Vehicles: The drag applied to the wheels of carriages to check their velocity in going down hills.

B. As adj.: Acting as an escort or protecting force on a journey.

"Convoy ships accompany their merchants,..."—Dryden: Dufresnoy; Pref.

* cón-vøy-ange, s. [Eng. convoy; anox.] Art, finesse, skilful or artful management.

convulse, v.t. & t. [Lat. convulsus, pa. par. of convello = to pluck up, to dislocate, to convulse: con = cum = with, altogether, and vello = to pluck.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To cause a shrinking or contracting motion in the sinews or muscular parts of the body; to affect with convulsions.

"His head grows fever'd, and his pulse The quick excessive throbs convulse." Byron: The Siege of Corinth.

2. To shake, to agitate.

II. Figuratively:

1. To cause a kind of convulsed feeling.

2. To shake violently, to agitate greatly.

"... a question which would, in our age, convulse the whole frame of society." Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

* B. Intrans. : To suffer from or be thrown into convulsions.

"Nor to prescribe when aëræ convulse." Green: The Spleen.

convulsed, pa. par. or a. [CONVULSE.]

convuls-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [CONVULSE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of affecting with or throwing into convulsions.

convul-sion, s. [Lat. convulsio, from convulso, pa. par. of convello.] [CONVULSE.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. In the same sense as B.

"Convulsions dire Seized him, that self-same night..." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

* 2. A violent shaking.

"Those two massive pillars With horrible convulsion to and fro He tugg'd." Milton: Samson Agonistes.

II. Fig.: A violent agitation or disturbance; commotion.

"... the same convulsions of state,..." Temple.

B. Med.: A diseased action of the muscular tissues of a greater or less portion of the body, characterized by violent muscular contractions with alternate relaxations. Such action of the muscles is, however, impossible unless nervous influence be first transmitted to them by the brain and nerves, and it is in these latter that the seat of the disease lies. As is natural, infants and young children, females, and men of the temperament called nervous, are most susceptible of convulsions. Hence one species of this genus of disease is called infantile and another Puerperal Convulsions, the former affecting infants, the latter appearing in women towards the conclusion of pregnancy or immediately after childbirth. Convulsions have been divided into tonic convulsions, in which the contractions are of some duration and are not quickly succeeded by alternate relaxations, and clonic convulsions, in which the contraction is briefer and relaxation comes more quickly. Of the former tetanus is an example, and of the latter hysteria. Some have restricted the term convulsion to those of a tonic character. When the alternate contractions and relaxations are but slight, and very quickly succeed each other, the affection is called tremor. Convulsions specially affect the voluntary muscles, in this differing from apasm, which is applied chiefly, though not exclusively, to similar action of the muscles called involuntary. They may be local, affecting only certain muscles of the eyes, the face, the throat, the thorax, or they may be general over the body. They may be idiopathic or symptomatic of other diseases. They may arise from congestion of the brain or from its deficient nutriment, or from mechanical irritation or injury of nerves. Slight convulsions are, in many cases, unattended with danger, whilst those which are severe are dangerous in a high degree.

convul-sion-al, a. [Eng. convulsion; -al.] Pertaining or relating to a convulsion or to convulsions.

convul-sion-ar-ry, a. & s. [Eng. convulsion, and suff. -ary; Fr. convulsionnaire.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to convulsions, convulsive.

"... convulsory struggles..." -Scott.

* B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: One affected by convulsions.

2. Ch. Hist.: The same as CONVULSIONISTS (q.v.).

Convul-sion-ists, s. pl. [Eng. convulsion, and suff. -ists; Fr. convulsionnistes.]

1. Ch. Hist.: The name given to a section of the Jansenists who arose in France in 1730. They were accustomed to throw themselves upon the ground and go into convulsions. Three years afterwards an order was sent forth for their imprisonment. [CONVULSIONARY, B. 2.]

2. Geol.: (See extract).

"The Convulsionists, or believers in the paramount efficacy of subterranean movement." -A. Geikie, in Macmillan's Mag., July, 1881, p. 229.

convul-sive, a. [Fr. convulsif (m.), convulsive (f); Sp., Port., & Ital. convulsivo, all from Lat. convulsus, pa. par. of convello = to tear up, to pluck up, to wrench off: con = cum = with, together, and vello = to pluck, to pull.] Pertaining to convulsions, produced by convulsions, alternately contracting and relaxing the muscles.

1. Ord. Lang.: In a loose sense.

"But ask thou not it! Happless be there, If the loud laugh disguise convulsive throes, Or if the hush the heart's true liver wear." Scott: The Lord of the Isles, ll. 1.

2. Med.: In the strict sense. [CONVULSION.]

"Convulsive affections have been classed by most neurologists among the neuroses or nervous diseases." -A. Crawford, in Cyclop. Pract. Med., l. 466.

"They that would ride in the cole of the mornynge."
—Martin, I. II. 191.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between cool, cold, and frigid: "In the natural sense, cool is simply the absence of warmth; cold and frigid are positively contrary to warmth; the former in regard to objects in general, the latter to moral objects; in the physical sense the analogy is strictly preserved. With regard to the passions, cool designates a freedom from agitation, which is a desirable quality. Coolness in a time of danger, and coolness in an argument, are alike commendable. As cool and cold respect the affections, the cool is opposed to the friendly, the cold to the warm-hearted, the frigid to the animated; the former is but a degree of the latter. A reception is said to be cool; an embrace to be cold; a sentiment frigid. Coolness is an enemy to social enjoyments; coldness is an enemy to every moral virtue; frigid destroys all force of character. Coolness is engendered by circumstances; it supposes the previous existence of warmth; coldness lies often in the temperament, or is engendered by habit; it is always something vicious; frigid is occasional, and is always a defect. Trifling differences produce coolness sometimes between the best friends; trade sometimes engenders a cold calculating temper in some minds; those who are remarkable for apathy will often express themselves with frigid indifference on the most important subjects." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

1. One whose trade it is to make and repair casks, barrels, tubs, &c.

"The cooper's house is heald by hoop'ng fatters."
Gascoigne: The Fruits of Warra.

¶ The London coopers were incorporated into a guild or company in A.D. 1501.

2. A popular name for a beverage composed of stout and porter in equal proportions. The name is said to be derived from the custom at breweries of allowing the coopers each day a certain quantity of stout and porter, which they were in the habit of mixing before drinking.

¶ The tight-cooper, as also the wet-cooper, makes casks for holding liquid, and is the representative of the first inventor. The dry-cooper makes casks for goods not in a liquid state, such as flour, rice, dried fruits, soda, &c. The white-cooper makes butter casks, tubs, pails, and churns, and combines in some measure the skill and knowledge of his two elder brothers. A cooper-in-general is seldom a skilled workman, but a jobber and mender of other men's work. (Weale.)

cooper's hammer, s. A hammer with a narrow peen, whose length is in the plane of the motion of the hammer; used for battering and flaring an iron hoop to fit the bulge of a cask. Also called a fine-hammer.

A. Trans.: To operate on in the manner of a cooper.

B. Intrans.: To follow the trade or occupation of a cooper; to make and repair casks, barrels, tubs, &c.

coop-ër-äge, s. [Eng. cooper; -age.]

1. The trade or business of a cooper; the coopering of casks, &c.

2. A place where the trade or business of a cooper is carried on; a place for the manufacture and repairs of casks, barrels, &c.

"Warehouses, soap-walks, cooperages, &c."—Defoe's Tour through Great Britain, l. 26. (Davies.)

3. The price paid for work done by a cooper.

*oo-öp-ër-ant, a. & s. [Fr., pr. par. of coopérer = to work together, as if from a Lat. coopero: co = con = with, together, and opero = to work; opus = work.]

A. As adj.: Operating or working together with; cooperating.

"Bounded and conditioned by coopérant Reason, ..." —Tyndall's Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), vii. 130-1.

B. As subst.: A cooperating agent; one who or that which cooperates with another for a common end.

"... no cause thereof nor coopérant thereto." —Sir T. More's Works, p. 353.

oo-öp-ër-äte, v.t. [Pref. co = con = with, and Lat. operatus, pa. par. of operor = to work; opus = work; Ital. cooperare; Sp. cooperar; Fr. coopérer.]

1. Of persons: To act or operate conjointly with others for a common end; to labour in conjunction for the promotion of the common advantage.

"... whose hard fate it has been to cooperate with Spaniards ..." —Macaulay's Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

2. Of things: To concur or unite in producing the same effect, or in promoting the same object. (Generally followed by with before the person or thing assisted.)

"Nature and habit cooperating ..." —Macaulay's Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

(a) Followed by to before the end in view.

(b) Followed by in.

3. To contribute to.

"Bring all your lutes and harps of heav'n and earth: Whate'er cooperates to the common nrth." —Crashaw: The Name above every Name.

oo-öp-ër-ät-îng, pr. par., a., & s. [COOPERATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of labouring together with others for a common end; cooperation.

oo-öp-ër-ät-ion, s. [Lat. cooperatio; Fr. coopération; Sp. cooperación.] [COOPERATE, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of persons: The act of labouring together with others for a common end; conjoint or concurrent labour or efforts.

"... zealous and strenuous cooperation." —Macaulay's Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

2. Of things: Concurrence in producing the same effect or in promoting the common advantage.

II. Political Economy:

1. Definition: The combined action of numbers of persons. It is of two kinds: simple cooperation, when several individuals help each other in the same employment, and complex cooperation, when they do so in different employments.

2. Hist.: The pioneer of cooperation in Britain and America was Robert Owen. For some details of his views and work see COMMUNISM. Though his great philanthropic projects failed, yet they suggested cooperation. Not that the idea was really new; it had been practised to a limited extent in most countries. It is a form of partnership. It may be of two kinds, cooperation in production and cooperation in distribution. During the French revolution of 1848, the Constituent Assembly voted the equivalent of £120,000 sterling to encourage cooperation, a commission being appointed to distribute the sum among workmen desirous of rising to the level of capitalists. About 300 cooperative societies at once sprung into existence, 100 of them in Paris, the rest in the provinces, all of which became extinct within twenty years, except, it is believed, about twenty. Most of the twenty, however, rose to prosperity, as did others to a larger extent which had not obtained government assistance. The movement spread to Germany, but few of the cooperative societies there are for production. The Rochdale Cotton Mill was founded in 1856, and in 1864 the Wholesale Society was established at Manchester, and that at Glasgow was founded some five years later. In 1873 the Cooperative Union was organized, and the annual production by societies connected with it is estimated at over £5,000,000. The Wholesale Society (for the two are practically one institution) has depôts in Ireland and America, and on the Continent. It possesses a small fleet of steamers, and carries on boot and shoe and cloth factories and soap works. Cooperation in distribution is designed to share the retail profits by dispensing with the middlemen. Rochdale is, as Mr. Holyoake words it, the "Mecca of cooperation." In 1844 a few flannel-weavers clubbed together their small subscriptions and founded a small cooperative store. It has risen to great prosperity, and its success has led to the establishment of a multitude of other stores of a like nature. In the United States cooperation has made less progress than in Britain, and there is nothing here to compare in importance with the famous Rochdale experiment. There has been a large development of mutual insurance, and the building and loan societies of Philadelphia form another example of cooperative action. Cooperative distribution has attained no marked success, and cooperative production still less. Profit-sharing is the nearest approach to this principle in manufacturing concerns.

co-öp-ër-ät-ive, a. [Pref. co, and Eng. operative (q.v.).] Labouring conjointly or concurrently with others for a common end, or the promotion of the common advantage.

"The same hath reason made so agreeable, so obedient, so friendly, and cooperative." —Holland's Picturich, p. 52.

cooperative society, s. A society designed for cooperative purposes. [COOPERATION.]

co-öp-ër-ät-ör, s. [Lat. cooperator; Fr. coopérateur; Sp. cooperador; Ital. cooperatore.] [COOPERATE, v.] One who labours with another for a common end, or the promotion of the common advantage.

coop-ër-îng, a. & s. [Eng. cooper; -ing.]

A. As adj.: Following the trade or occupation of a cooper.

B. As subst.: The trade or occupation of a cooper; the art or business of manufacturing and repairing casks, barrels, tubs, &c., and all kinds of circular or elliptic wooden vessels bound together by hoops.

co-öp-ër-tö-rî-üm, s. [Lat.] Arch.: The roof of a building. (Weale.)

†coop-ër-ÿ, *cöo'-për-ÿe, s. & a. [Eng. cooper; -y.]

A. As substantive:

1. The trade or occupation of a cooper.

2. A place where cooper's work is done; a cooperage.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the trade of a cooper; of the nature of cooper's work.

"... steepie the wheat withln certaine cooperative vessels made of wood, ..." —Holland's Pinnic, bk. xviii, ch. v.i.

†co-öp-t', v.t. [Fr. coopier, from Lat. coopio = to clect into a body.] To elect into any body; to cooptate.

*co-öp-tätc, v.t. [Lat. cooptatus, pa. par. of coopio = to elect into a body; co = con = with, together, and opto = to choose.] To choose or elect into any body. (Cockeram.)

co-öp-tä-tion, s. [Fr. cooptation; Ital. cooptazione; Sp. cooptación, from Lat. cooptatio = an electing into a body; coopio = to elect into a body.]

*1. The act of choosing or selecting; choice, selection.

"In the first election and cooptation of a friend, ..." —Boswell's Letters, bk. i., § 5, Lett. 20.

2. The act of electing or assuming into a body or office by the members of that body, as, for example, when a person is elected fellow of a college or society by the existing body of fellows.

"... two were chosen by suffrage, and three by cooptation." —Lewis's Cred. Early Roman Hist.

*co-ör-däin, v.t. [Pref. co = con = with, and Eng. ordinis (q.v.).] To ordain or appoint together or at the same time.

*co-ör-din-änçe, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. ordinance (q.v.).] A joint ordinance.

co-ör-din-äte, a. & s. [Pref. co = con; Lat. ordinatus, pa. par. of ordino = to arrange in order or rank; ordo = an order.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Holding the same rank; not subordinate; of equal rank or authority.

"Whether there was one Supreme Governor of the whole world, or many coordinate powers, presiding over each country, climate or particular place." —Lao: Theory of Religion, pt. II.

II. Technically:

1. Biol.: Of the same order, of the same rank; not subordinate the one to the other, but standing on the same level.

"The coördinats, like other movements of the voluntary muscles, are liable to be influenced by passions and affections of the mind." —Todd & Bowman's Physiol. Anat., vol. I., ch. vii., p. 198.

2. Law & Gram.: A term used in the explanation of clauses doubtful in their meaning when these occur in Acts of Parliament. If two clauses are equally governed by a third one, the two are said to be coordinate to each other, or simply coordinate.

† Coordinate in this sense is opposed to subordinate, which is the term used when, of two clauses, one is grammatically governed by another. (Wharton.)

B. As substantive:

Geom., &c. (Pl.): Two lines, generally at right angles to each other, employed to fix the place of any point. Thus on a globe parallels of latitude and meridians of longitude are coordinates, which, taken together, fix, with nearly mathematical accuracy, the position of any place on the globe, and would do so with perfect exactness were it a strictly geometrical figure. It is not essential that the angles made by two coordinates be right angles, though right angles are most commonly employed as most convenient for use.

† The reason why the term coordinate was given is that if various points in a curve be fixed by such lines the several points of the curve may be treated in order. Descartes first introduced the method of fixing the position of a point or series of points in the way just described. It is now continually in use. One division is into Rectilinear and Polar Coordinates, each of which may be in a plane or in a space (that is, not in a given plane).

co-ör-din-äte, v.t. [COORDINATE, a.] To make coordinate; to arrange in proper orders and classes; to adjust, to harmonize.

"The different parts of each being must be coordinated in such a manner as to render the total being possible." —Watts.

co-ör-din-ä-téd, pa. par. or a. [COORDINATE, v.]

co-ör-din-äte-lÿ, adv. [Eng. coordinate; -ly.] In a coordinate manner or degree; without subordination; in the same rank, relation, or degree.

co-ör-din-äte-nëss, s. [Eng. coordinate; -ness.] The state or quality of being coordinate, or of the same degree or rank; equality of rank or authority.

co-ör-din-ät-îng, pr. par., a., & s. [COORDINATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or process of making coordinate; coordination.

co-ör-din-ät-ion, s. [Ital. coordinazione; Sp. coordinación.]

1. The act of making coordinate, or bringing into a state of equality of degree or rank; the act of arranging in due rank and order.

"The coordination of muscular movement by the cerebellum." —Carpenter, in Webster.

fäte, fät, fáre, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wö, wët, hère, camél, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gö, pöt, ör, wöre, wölf, wörk, whò, sòn; müte, cüb, öure, unte, cür, räle, füll; try, Sÿrian. æ, œ = é. ey = ä. qu = kw.

2. The state or quality of being coordinate or of equal rank and authority.

"... a rare coordination of power..."—Hewel: Pre-eminence of Parliament.

oō-or-āin-āt-īve, a. [Eug. coordinat(e); -īve.]

Gram.: Expressing coordination.

*cooste, s. [COST (1), s.] Costmary.

"Cooste, herbe. Costus."—Prompt. Parv.

*coost-tre, s. [COSTERE.]

oōot, *coote (1), *cote (1), s. [Dut. koet; Wel. cwtiar = a bob-tailed hen, from cwta = short, docked; cwtan = to dock, and iar = a hen; cwtial, cwtyn = a plover; Gael. cut = a bob-tail, cutach = short, docked. (Skeat.)]

1. Ornithology:

(1) A British wading bird, Fulica atra, belonging to the family Rallidae, and the subfamily Gallinulines (Water Hens). The head and neck are deep black, the upper parts slaty black, those beneath bluish ash, the bill and frontal plate white, the former with a slightly roseate hue, iris crimson, feet ash-coloured with greenish tinge below the knee, above it yellow or greenish red. It occurs in Britain, but is more abundant in Holland and France. It is found also in Germany, Switzerland, and throughout Europe. It has been seen also in Japan. Its appropriate habitat is in rushy sheets of water. The nest, built early in the spring, is made of rushes, grasses, &c. It deposits from seven to ten eggs of a brownish white colour, spotted with dark brown. It remains in this country in winter in sheets of water near the sea, the mud flats at Southampton being one of its favourite places of resort.

COOT.

"Coote, hydre. Mergus, fulicæ."—Prompt. Parv.

(2) The Guillemot. (Scotch.)

2. A simpton, a silly fellow. (Provincial.)

cooth-īe, a. [COUTH.] Kind, affectionate. (Scotch.)

"And see that ye be coothis till her."—Duff: Poems, p. 100.

oōot-īe, coōt-īy, a. [Eng. cool; -īe, -y.] A term applied to those fowls whose legs are clad with feathers.

"Rejoice, ye birring patrieks; "

Ye coote moorcocks, crossly craw."

Burns: Tam Samson's Blegy.

oōot-īe, a. [COODIE.]

1. A wooden kitchen dish.

2. A bucket shaped like a barrel.

cōp (1), **s.* A policeman (U. S. slang).

cōp (2), *coppe, s. [A.S. copp; Dut. kop; O. H. Ger. choph; Icel. koppur; Dan. kop; Sw. kopp.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The top or summit of anything; the extreme point. Used—

(1) Of a hill, a house, a tree, &c.

"The... ledge him to the cop of the hill"—Wycliffe: Luke, lv. 29.

(2) Of the head of a man.

"Bi the coppe he him nam."—Layamon, l. 30.

2. A tuft on the heads of birds, a crest.

3. A blow. (Slang.)

II. Technically:

1. Fort.: A merlon or portion of a battlement.

2. Spinning:

(1) The conical ball of thread wound upon a spindle or tube in a spinning-machine, and removable by slipping therefrom. Also called coppin (q.v.).

(2) A tube, also known as a quill (q.v.), for winding silk upon in given lengths for market, a substitute for skeins. Being hollow it may be placed on the spindle or skewer of any winding-machine. The silk end is secured in a slot, as in the case of apoola. (Knight.)

cōp (3), s. [A contraction for Eng. copper (?).] A term occurring only in the following compound.

cōp-rose, s. A poppy, Papaver Rhœas. It is called also Copper-rose (q.v.).

*cōp (1), v.t. [COP (2), s.] To throw at the head.

"I could have cop't them at their pates."

Bloomfield: The Horkey. (Davies.)

cōp (2), v.t. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps from O. Fr. caper = to seize.] To catch. (Slang.)

cō-pā-hēne, s. [COPAIBA OIL.]

cō-pā-hil-ēne, s. [COPAIBA OIL.]

cōp-āi-bā, oō-pāi-vā, ca-pī-vī, s. [Fr. copahu; Sp. copaiba, from Port. (Brazilian Indian ?) copaiba.]

Pharm.: The balsam or oleo-resin obtained from incisions made in the trunk of Copaifera multijuga and other species of Copaifera (q.v.). Copaliba is about the consistence of olive oil, light in colour and transparent, with a peculiar odour, and an acrid aromatic taste; it is perfectly soluble in an equal volume of benzene; it does not become gelatinous when heated to 270° Fahr., and is not fluorescent. It contains a resin, Copalvic acid, and an essential oil, Copaliba oil. It dissolves one-fourth of its weight of magnesia carbonate when heated, and remains transparent; it is said that a small quantity of water contained in the balsam first combines with the magnesia, forming a hydrate which is soluble in the resin. Copaliba acts as a stimulant on the mucous membranes, especially on the genitourinary organs. It is also a powerful diuretic.

copaliba balsam, s. An oily resin of an amber colour; it is used as a vehicle in oil-painting, and also as a varnish. (Weale.) copaliba oil, s.

Chem.: A colourless transparent, mobile, peculiar smelling oil, obtained by distilling Copaliba with water, and drying over calcium chloride and rectifying. It boils at 260°. Its optical rotatory power is 34.16° to the left. It becomes brown and viscid by continued boiling. Chlorine colours it yellow-green, then blue, and then white crystals separate out. Nitric acid heated with it turns it into a resin. When distilled with calcium hypochlorite it yields chloroform. When hydrochloric acid gas is passed into copaliba oil, it precipitates a crystalline hydrochlorate, called also Hydrochlorate of Copahene or Copavene (C<sub>15</sub>H<sub>21</sub>3HCl), which is obtained by recrystallisation from alcohol in transparent prisms, which melt at 77°, and are insoluble in water and cold alcohol, but easily soluble in ether. A liquid substance is formed at the same time, which is called Hydrochlorate of Copahilene. It is a black viscid oil, soluble in alcohol and ether.

copaliba resin, s. [COPAIVIC ACID.]

cōp-āi-fē-ra, s. [Eng. copaiba]; Lat. fero = to bear, to produce.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous plants, sub-order Casalpinieæ, tribe Cynometrææ. It has sometimes been placed amongst the Amyridaceæ. The calyx is 4-partite, the petals 0, the stamens 10, declinate. The ovary has two ovules, but the two-valved fruit is only one-seeded. Leaves alternate; pinnated leaflets, sometimes dotted. Inflorescence in axillary and terminal spikes. C. Jacquinii or officinalis furnishes the West Indian Copalva balsam. C. Langsdorffii and C. coriacea, with various other species, are said to furnish the Copalva balsam of Brazil. C. pubiflora and bracteata, Guiana trees, furnish a very tough timber, called Purple Heart, well fitted to resist the discharges of artillery.

cōp-āi-vā, s. [COPAIBA.]

cōp-āi-vēne, s. [COPAIBA OIL.]

cōp-āi-vic, a. [Eng. copaiva]; and suff. -īe.]

copalvic acid, s.

Chem.: Also called Copahvic acid. A crystalline resin, which exists in Copaliba balsam. It is separated by dissolving the resins which remain after the oil has been distilled off in aqueous ammonia, and leaving the solution to evaporate in a cool place. It is purified by washing with ether and recrystallising from alcohol. Copalvic acid forms colourless rhombic crystals, soluble in strong alcohol, which are decomposed on heating. It is to have the formula C<sub>20</sub>H<sub>32</sub>O<sub>2</sub>.

cō-pāi, s. [Sp. copal, from Mexican copalli = resin.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Chem.: A resin produced by a plant, Rhus copallinum, which grows in Mexico. It is obtained in rounded, nearly transparent, masses; it is brittle in texture and colourless, or slightly yellow. It is slightly soluble in alcohol and essential oils, and is made into varnish by mixing in a melted state with oils. Compos.: Carbon, 78 to 80%; hydrogen, 87 to 105; oxygen, 79 to 107 per cent.

"(1) Brazilian copal: "Copal" flowing from several species of Hymenæa, and from Trachylobotum Mortianum.

(2) Indian copal: A resin obtained from Vateria indica. It is called in England Gum animi.

(3) Madagascar copal: Hymenæa verrucosa.

(4) Mexican copal: Hymenæa Conibarii.

2. Min.: A mineral called fossil copal, copaline, or copalite. [COPALITE.]

copal varnish, s. A varnish made from copal. It is durable and brilliant, and may be used in the manufacture of philocephical instruments.

oō-pāi-ghé, s. [Mexican.]

copaloha bark, s. The name given to two kinds of bark resembling Cascarilla (q.v.). They are the Brazilian and the Mexican Copaloha bark. The former is from Strychnos pseudo-quina, and the latter from Croton pseudo-china.

cō-pal-īne, s. [Eng., &c. copal; and suff. -īne.]

Min.: The same as COPALITE (q.v.).

cō-pal-īte, s. [Eng., &c. copal; and suff. -īte (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: A combustible mineral of a yellow, gray, or brown colour. It resembles copal in hardness, colour, lustre, transparency, and in the difficulty with which it is dissolved in alcohol. Compos.: Carbon, 85.7; hydrogen, 11.4; oxygen, 2.9 = 100. It is found in the London clay of Highgate, on which account it is sometimes called Highgate resin. It is found also in the East India. Copalite is called also copaline and fossil copal.

cōp-ām-rīy, s. [Mid. Eng. cop = cup, and amry = amry (q.v.).] A press or closet for keeping cups, &c.

"A langand bed, a copamry, & ane schurlog."—Aberd. Reg.

*cō-par-çen-a-rīy, *cō-par-çen-a-rie, s. [Eng. coparcener; -y.] Joint succession or inheritance in any estate; a partnership in heirship.

"In descent to all the daughters in coparcenary."

"Hale: History of Common Law.

*cō-par-çen-ēr, *cō-par-çin-ēr, a. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. parcener (q.v.).] One who has part or share with another; a coheir to an estate; a copartner.

3. The roof of a house, and hence the house itself.

"All these things that are contain'd Within this goodly cope, both most and least."—Spenser.

4. The arch over a doorway.

B. Technically:

1. Eccles. : An ecclesiastical vestment resembling a cloak. It takes its name from the cappa or hood, which was originally a very necessary and highly ornamental appendage.

It is made of various materials: silk, satin, velvet, cloth, &c., of different colours, and richly embroidered.

COPES.

It is fastened across the breast by a jewelled clasp. When laid out flat it is in shape an exact semicircle.

It is worn in the Roman Catholic Church by clergy of all ranks. As distinguished from the chasuble (q.v.) it is a processional vestment, while the chasuble is Eucharistic.

The cope is one of the vestments worn in Ritualistic churches, but it was decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the case of Hibbert v. Pearch, 1871, that "the cope is to be worn in mis-tering the Holy Communion on high feast days in cathedrals and collegiate churches, and the surplice in all other ministrations."

2. Founding: The top part of a mould; the lower is the drag. [FLASK.]

Zool. : Any individual of the Copepoda. (q.v.)

"Both marine and fresh water Copepoda are known."—Nicholson: Zool. (5th ed.), p. 278.

cō-pēp'-ō-dā, s. pl. [Gr. κόπη (kōpē) = a handle, an ear, and ποῦς (pous), genit. ποδός (podos) = a foot.]

1. Zool. : An order of Crustacea, ranked under the sub-class Entomostraca and the legion Lophyropoda. They are animals of small size, the body divided into two segments, viz., a cephalothorax and an abdomen. There are two pairs of antennae, two pairs of footjaws, and five pairs of ordinary feet furnished with bristles and adapted for swimming. There is a jointed tail with a tuft of bristles at its extremity. Some are found in fresh water, others are marine. Prof. Huxley says that in addition to the species placed under Copepoda by Latreille and Milne-Edwards, the order contains some of the Epizoa or Ichthyophthira. There are two families, the Cyclopidae, which have but a single eye; and the Cetochildae, which have two eyes.

2. Paleont. : No certain proof has yet been obtained that the Copepoda occur fossil.

cō-pēp'-ō-dan, cō-pēp'-ō-dous, a. [Mod. Lat. copepod(o); Eng. suff. -ous.] Belonging to, or having the characteristics of, the Copepoda (q.v.). The first form is also used substantively.

1. Ord. Lang. : A dealer; now only surviving in this sense in the compound horse-coper (q.v.).

2. Lead-mining : One who contracts to raise lead ore at a fixed rate.

Cō-pēr'-nī-can, a. [Pertaining to Copernicus, the Latinised form of Copernik or Zopernic, a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, a canon of Thorn, in Prussia. He was born in 1473 or 1474, and died on May 23, 1543.] Pertaining to the celebrated astronomer, Copernicus. [See etymol.]

¶ (1) Copernican hypothesis:

Astron. : The view regarding the solar system promulgated by Copernicus, and which he was careful for ecclesiastical reasons to call a hypothesis instead of a theory. Pope Pius VII., in the early part of the nineteenth century, having promised a repeal of the Papal edict against the Copernican system, no offence was afterwards taken at Rome if the Roman Catholic professors called the Copernican views a theory, which they had not before been permitted to do, having been required to employ the term hypothesis. (Lyell: Princip. of Geol., bk. I, ch. iv.)

(2) Copernican system:

Astron. : The system of astronomy promulgated by Copernicus, which in most of its essential features was identical with that now accepted. Previous to his time the system in vogue was the Ptolemaic one as modified by Tycho Brahe. Both of these eminent men had placed the earth in the centre of their system, and made the sun and the planets to revolve around it. Copernicus took the great step forward of placing the sun in the centre, and reducing the earth to the comparatively humble position of a planet. The places which he assigned to the planets were essentially correct, but he failed to explain accurately the laws which regulated their movements. He supposed that they must be united to the central body—the sun—by bars, like Ptolemy's epicycles. It was not till Kepler and Newton had made two other great movements forward that the mechanism of the heavens came to be understood. There is injustice to these men when the term Copernican system is held to embrace discoveries made subsequent to the time of Copernicus. (Prof. Atry, dc.)

(3) Copernican theory: Astron.: The theory or explanation given by Copernicus of the solar system. [COPERNICAN HYPOTHESIS.]

cōp-ēr-nī-cī-a, s. [Named after Copernicus.] [COPERNICAN.]

Ger. kuphar; Gael. kopar; Wel. kop; Fr. cuire; Sp. & Port. cobre, all from Lat. of the third cent. A.D. cuprum, s. contr. for cyprum, es = copper ore from Cyprus, Lat. Cypirus, Gr. Κύπρος (kupros) = the well-known island, which anciently had celebrated copper mines.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Gen.: The metal described under II. 1 (2).

2. Specially:

(1) A coin of copper—a penny, a halfpenny, or a farthing.

(2) A vessel or utensil, esp. a large vessel for cooking or washing. Such were originally of copper, but are now more frequently made of iron. In the pl. the term is applied to the large cooking boilers on board ship. "They boiled it in a copper to the half."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: A dyad metallic element. symbol, Cu; atomic weight, 63.5; sp. gr., 8.95; melting point, 1,091°C. Copper is a red, malleable, ductile, tenacious metal, which sometimes occurs native. It does not decompose water at red heat, nor oxidise in dry air; at red heat it oxidises to a black oxide. Heated with strong sulphuric acid, So<sub>2</sub> is liberated bell, boy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, ohorn, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -dan, -tian = ehan. -tion, -sion = shün. -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -sious, -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

and cupric sulphate formed. It is easily dissolved by nitric acid,  $\text{NO}_2$  being given off and cupric nitrate formed. Copper forms several alloys. Brass is an alloy of two-thirds copper and one-third zinc; bronze, gun-metal, and bell-metal are alloys of copper with tin. Copper forms sets of compounds, the cuprous and cupric salts. [CUPRIC, CUPROUS, and their compounds.] Copper pyrites is a cuproferrous sulphide. Copper arsenite, or Scheele's green, is used as a pigment for wall papers, &c.; it is very poisonous. Compounds of copper with ammonia are known. Copper salts are detected by giving in an acid solution a black precipitate with  $\text{H}_2\text{S}$ . By giving a blue precipitate with  $\text{KHO}$  it becomes black on boiling. When a piece of clean steel is placed in a solution, copper is deposited on it. Ammonia gives a blue precipitate, which dissolves in excess, forming a dark-blue solution. Potassium ferrocyanide gives a red-brown precipitate of ferrocyanide of copper, which is soluble in ammonia, forming a blue solution. All salts of copper are poisonous. Verdigris is an acetate of copper, often formed by cooking food in copper vessels.

2. Alchem.: Copper was represented by the alchemists by the same sign as the planet Venus, both the metal and the goddess being associated with the island of Cyprus.

3. Min.: A ductile and malleable isometric mineral, often in twin crystals, with the composition face octahedral, or a double six-sided pyramid, or filliform and arborescent. Hardness, 2.5–3; sp. gr., 8–8.9 or more; colour, copper-red; streak metallic, fracture hackly. Compos.: Copper, pure or with a slight admixture of silver, bismuth, &c. It is found in beds and veins, chiefly near volcanic dykes, in serpentine, &c., or loes in the soil. It occurs abundantly in the United States, particularly in Michigan, the mines at Calumet, on Lake Superior, in that state, being the richest in the world. This country is the largest producer of copper.

4. Naut.: [A. I. 1 (2).]

5. Archæol., Hist., &c.: Copper has been known since prehistoric times. There may have been a copper age before that of bronze. [Bronze.] The latter compound metal, an alloy of copper and tin, was known long before brass, an alloy of copper and zinc, had been made. The word copper occurs once in the Old Testament (Ezra viii. 27), but what is in many places called brass should have been rendered copper. [BRASS.] Copper was in use in ancient Assyria. The classical nations were familiar with it. The Greeks brought it from Cyprus, the mines being at Tamassos, near Famagosta. Copper mines were first opened in England in A.D. 1189, but not very successfully till A.D. 1689.

6. Entom. (Pl.): [COPPER-BUTTERFLY.]

7. Soap-making: The boiling-pan.

† (1) Hot coppers: Parched throat and mouth from the effects of drink. (Slang.)

(2) To catch copper: To come to grief. (Slang.)

"Go to, no more, Barber, least copper you catch."

cōp'-rā, s. [Fr. copre; from a native Indian word.] The dried kernel of the cocoa-nut after the oil has been expressed. It is used in India as an ingredient in curry.

* cōp'-prēs'-bŷ-tōr, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. prebyster (q.v.).] A clergyman belonging to the same prebyster as another.

cōp'-rī-dæ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. copris (q.v.), and Lat. fem. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: In some classifications a family of Lamellicorn Beetles, though Swainson reduced them to a series of genera placed under his sub-family Scarabæina. They have convex bodies, large heads, with the clypeus projecting all round it, the males with projections on the head and thorax. They make large deep holes beneath dry dung. They are found throughout the world. Some are of large size. These are chiefly from tropical Africa and the East India.

cōp'-rīs, s. [From Gr. κόπρις (koprīs) = a dunging, a manuring; κόπριζω (koprīzō) = to dung, to manure. Cf. also κόπριων (koprīōn) = a dung beetle, all from κόπρος (kopros) = dung.]

Entom.: A genus of Lamellicorn Beetles, the typical one of the family Copridæ (q.v.). One species, Copris lunaris, is found in Britain. It is black in colour. It extends through all Europe.

cōp'-rō-līte, s. [Gr. κόπρος (kopros) = dung, and λίθος (lithos) = a stone.]

I. Palæont.: The dung of various animals found fossil, and sometimes so perfect as to indicate, not merely what the several species fed upon, but also the dimensions, form, and structure of their stomach and of their intestinal canal. On the shore at Lyme Regis they lie thickly in some parts of the Lias like potatoes on the ground; they abound also in the estuary of the Severn. They tend to occur in all formations, especially where vertebrates are found. Some are of fishes, some of reptiles, and magnificent coprolites originating from the hyena were found in Kirkdale Cavern and other places. (Zueckland: Geol. & Min., &c.)

2. Min.: Dana gives as a synonym of the coprolites described under I, Phosphatic nodules, and associates them, but as a distinct species, with Apatite (q.v.). But some phosphatic nodules once believed to be coprolite, such as those of the Upper Greensand, though apparently of organic origin, are not now believed to be the dung of any animal.

cōp'-rōl-īt-īc, a. [Eng. coprolite(e); -ic.] Composed of or containing coprolites; of the nature of or resembling coprolites.

"Then, as additional evidence of the predaceous habits of these fish, there are the coprolitic bodies,..."—Murchison: Siluria, ch. ix.

cōp'-sī'-chōs, s. [Gr. κόπιχος (kopsichos) = a blackbird.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds, sub-family Erythracine, or Robina. Copsychus scularis is called by the natives of Ceylon the Dayal, and by the English the Magpie Robin. It occurs also in India, where the rich natives set them to fight. (Dallas.)

Cōpt (Egyptian pronunciation, gūbt or gībt), s. [Arab. Kubt, Kūbt. Said to have been derived from Kupt (Coptos), a city in Upper Egypt, now Kooft or Goft, to which the Christians sometimes fled during persecution by the Romans. But Renandot shows that this derivation is not satisfactory. The Rev. Dr. John Wilson considers that the Arab Gūbt or Gībt is simply Gr. Αἴγυπτος (Aiguptos) = Egypt. (Dr. Wilson: Lands of the Bible, II, 519.)]

- 1. Ch. Hist. & Ecclesiol.: One belonging to the Coptic Church (q.v.).
- 2. Ethnol.: One of the old Egyptian race, though perhaps with a dash of Greek, Nubian, or Abyssinian blood.

* cop-tankt, a. [COPPLE-TANKED.] High-peaked, conical.

"A cop-tankt hat, made on a Flemish block."—Gasc. Workes, N, 8 b.

Cōp'-tic, a. & s. [Eng., &c. Copt (q.v.), and suff. -ic.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to the people called Copts, or to their sect.

B. As subst.: The language spoken by the Copts formerly or now, unless where Arabic has displaced their native tongue. [COPTIC LANGUAGE.]

¶ (1) Coptic Church:
Ecclesiol. & Ch. Hist.: The remnants of the once numerous Church of Egypt—that which had the celebrated school at Alexandria. It broke off from the body Catholic in the embracing the Monophysite doctrine, viz., that not two natures, but only one, existed in Christ [MONOPHYTES], a view from which it has never since departed. When Jacob Baradaeus formed a slightly modified Monophysite sect, most of the Egyptian Christians became Jacobites. Being tyrannised over by the Greeks, they cheerfully submitted to the Mohammedans, under Amru ben Elaas, in A.D. 638, and aided him, in 640, to take Alexandria. Since then they have been trodden under foot by the Mohammedans. About 250,000 Copts still exist in Egypt, mostly in its upper province. They have a patriarch, bishops, presbyters, archdeacons, deacons, sub-deacons, lectors, cantors, and exorcists. They have two regular convents—those of St. Anthony and St. Paul, with a number of secondary monasteries.

(2) Coptic language: The language not of the old Egyptians who built the pyramids and covered monuments and temples with hieroglyphics, but of their successors subsequent to the introduction of Christianity. Theirs bore to the old Egyptian language a relation like that of the Italian to the Latin—i.e., the nucleus came from the old language, but there was an increasing ingress of foreign words. It continued till the tenth century, when it was in large measure superseded by Arabic. By the seventeenth it had ceased to be spoken, and existed only as a written dialect. Whilst it lived three dialects were recognised—the Sahidic, in Upper Egypt; the Bahiric or Memphitic, in Lower Egypt; and the Bashmuric, in the Delta.

cōp'-tīne, s. [Mod. Lat. cop(t)is]; Eng. suff. -ine.]

Chem.: A colourless alkaloid which occurs along with berberine in the root of Coptis tri- folia. Coptine dissolves in sulphuric acid, the solution becoming purple-red when heated; it gives a crystalline precipitate with a solution of mercuric potassium iodide.

cōp'-tīs, s. [Gr. κόπτις (koptis) = to cut; so named from the divisions of the leaves.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Ranunculaceae, tribe Helleboreae, sepals 5 or 6, coloured petaloid, petals small cucullate, capsules 6—10 on long stalks, 4—6 seeded. Coptis trifolia, Gold-thread, is a bitter, given in the United States as a cure for apthons affections of the mouth in children. It yields a yellow dye. The plant is not confined to America, but grows also in Norway, Siberia, Kamtchatka, &c.

cōp'-ū-la (pl. copulæ), s. [Lat. = a band or link.] [COUPLE.]

1. Gram.: That word in a sentence which acts as a link between the subject and the predicate.

¶ (1) Copulative conjunction:
Gram.: One which links together two or more subjects or predicates in an affirmative or negative proposition; as, Riches and honour come of thee.

(2) Copulative propositions:
Logic: (See extract).

"Copulative propositions are those which have more subjects or predicates connected by affirmative or negative conjunctions; as, Riches and honour are temptations to pride; Cesar conquered the Gauls and the Britons; neither gold nor jewels can purchase immortality."—Watts: Logic.

B. As substantive:

* I. Ordinary Language:

- 1. Connection, conjunction by marriage. "They understand polygamy to be a conjunction of divers copulatives in number..."—Bacon: State of the Greek Church, p. 307.
- 2. One desirous of copulation.

II. Gram.: A copulative conjunction.

"... he dyecmeth nothing between copulatives and disjunctives."—Sir T. Elgot: Workes, p. 943.

cōp'-ū-lāt-ive-ly, adv. [Eng. copulative; -ly.] In a copulative manner; by means of a copulative.

cōp'-ū-lā-tōr-ī, a. [Eng. copulat(s); -ory.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Copulative, uniting.

2. Physiol.: Pertaining to copulation; applied to the accessory generative organs.

* cōp'-wēb-lēss, a. [Eng. * copweb = cobweb; -less.] Without or free from cobwebs. "Built with copwebless beams."—Fuller: Worthies; Westminster, II, 163. [Davies.]

cōp'-y, * cōp'-īe, s. [Fr. copie = a copy of a writing; also store, abundance (Cotgrave); Lat.  copia = plenty, abundance.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. Originally in the Latin sense abundance, plenty, copiousness.

"... we may use the same liberty in our English versions out of Hebrew or Greek, for that copy or store that He hath given us."—The Translators of the Bible: Version of the Bible to the Reader (A.D. 1611). [French: Sacred Glossary, pp. 44-5.]

2. Fluency or copiousness of language. "He shall not need aytween plenty of the tongue called copie,..."—Sir T. Elgot: Governour, bk. I, ch. x.

3. The multiplication of copies of a book or any writing or document, being the way to obtain abundance of it; a transcript. "... the copy should deviate from the original."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. XIII.

4. An exercise in writing executed or to be executed after a pattern or model. [COPY-BOOK.]

5. Anything made in imitation of another; as a copy of a painting, engraving, statue, &c.

"Originals and copies much the same."—Bramston.

6. An original or model of which an imitation is or has to be made; a pattern. "Let him first learn to write, after a copy,..."—Holder: Elements of Speech.

7. An individual book, one of many books exactly the same. "My copy once belonged to Pope."—Warton: Hist. Eng. Poetry, § 69.

* 8. (Pl.): An army, forces.

* II. Fig.: An example to be imitated; a model, a pattern.

"Such a man Might be a copy to these younger times."—Shaksp.: All's Well, I, 2.

B. Technically:

* 1. Law:

(1) A legal instrument or form of tenure by which property is held. [COPYHOLD.]

"By copy all thy living lies to me."—Greene: Priar Bacon, p. 170.

(2) Copyhold property.

"What widow's copy or what orphan's legacy would have sale from us?"—Andrews: Serm., v. 27. [Davies.]

2. Printing: Written matter ready for or given to a compositor to be set up in type.

"... I would not deface your copy for the future, and only mark the repetitions..."—Pope: Letters; To H. Cromwell, Nov. 29, 1700.

3. Stationery: A size of writing-paper measuring 20 x 16 inches.

¶ (1) Copy of countenance: A fiam or humbug.

"If this application for my advice is not a copy of your countenance."—Foot: The Author, II, (Davies.)

(2) To set a copy: To write in an exercise-book a copy for a learner to imitate.

"We took him setting of boys' copies."—Shaksp.: 2 Hen. VI, IV, 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between copy, model, pattern, and specimen: "A copy and a model may be both employed either as an original work or as a work formed after an original. In the former sense, copy is used in relation to impressions, manuscripts, or writings, which are made to be copied by the printer, the writer, or the engraver; model is used in every other case, whether in morality or the arts: the proof will seldom be faulty when the copy is clear and correct. There can be no good writing formed after a bad copy; no human being has ever presented us with a perfect model of virtue. In the second sense copy is used for painting, and model for relief. The copy ought to be faithful, the model ought to be just; the former should delineate exactly what is delineated by the original; the latter should adhere to the precise rules of proportion observed in the original. The pictures of Raphael do not lose their attractions even in bad copies; the simple models of antiquity often equal in value originals of modern conception. Pattern and specimen approach nearest to model in signification: the idea of guidance or direction is prominent in them. The model always serves to guide in the execution of a work; the pattern serves either to regulate the work, or fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fall, father; wō, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trī; sīryan. ae, co = ē. ey = ā. qu = kw.

simply to determine the choice; the specimen helps only to form the opinion." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

copy-book, s. An exercise-book in writing, in which copies are written or printed for learners to imitate.

copy-head, s. The words or sentence written or printed on the top lines of copy-books as models in writing-exercises.

"Instruction to be given on the copy-head which is being done by the class."—Feuron: School Inspection, p. 40.

*copy-money, s. Money paid for copy or for literary work. (Boswell.)

cop'-y, *cop'-y-en, v.t. & i. [O. Fr. copier; Sp. & Port. copiar; Ital. copiare, from Lat. copia.] [COP'Y, s.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To transcribe or write out any document after an original; to make a copy of a writing or document. (Frequently with the adverb out.)

"My Lord Melun, let this be copied out, And keep it safe for our remembrance."—Shaksp.: King John, v. 2.

2. To imitate, to make or construct anything in imitation of an original.

"... never fail, when they copy, to follow the bad as well as the good things."—Dryden: DuRoiroy.

3. To imitate the style, language, or manner of another; to plagiarize.

II. Fig.: To imitate in manners, character, or life; to endeavour to resemble; to follow a pattern or model. (Frequently followed by the adverb out.)

"Set the examples, and their souls inflame To copy out their great forefather's fame."—Dryden: King Arthur.

B. Intransitive:

1. To do anything in imitation of an original or pattern; to make a copy.

(1) Followed by from before the thing copied.

"When a painter copies from the life, . . ."—Dryden.

(2) Followed by after.

"Several of our countrymen . . . seem very often to have copied after it in their dramatick writings."—Addison: Spectator.

2. To write down or transcribe the words, figures, &c., of another, with the intention of fraudulently passing them off for one's own.

"The temptation presents itself to those slender or careless members of the class to copy from their quicker class-fellows."—Feuron: School Inspection, p. 56.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to copy and to transcribe: "To copy respects the matter; to transcribe respects simply the act of writing. What is copied must be taken immediately from the original, with which it must exactly correspond; what is transcribed may be taken from the copy, but not necessarily in an entire state. Things are copied for the sake of getting the contents; they are often transcribed for the sake of clearness and fair writing. A copier should be very exact; a transcriber should be a good writer. Lawyers copy deeds, and have them afterwards frequently transcribed as occasion requires." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between to copy and to imitate, see IMITATE.

*cop'-yed, pa. par. or a. [COPIED,]

cop'-y-er, s. [COPIER.]

cop'-y-hold, s. & a. [Eng. copy, and hold.]

A. As substantive:

Law:

1. (See extract.)

"A tenure, for which the tenant hath nothing to shew but the copy of the rolls made by the steward of his lord's court. . . . This is called a base tenure, because it holds at the will of the lord; yet not simply, but according to the custom of the manor. . . . These customs or manners vary, in one point or other, almost in every manor. Some copy-holds are fee-simple, and some certain; that which is fee-simple, the lord rates at what fine or income he pleases, when the tenant is admitted into it; that which is certain, is a kind of inheritance, and called in many places customary; because the tenant dying, and the hold being void, the next of blood paying the customary fine, as two shillings for an acre, or so, cannot be denied his admission."—Covent.

2. Property held by such tenure.

B. As adjective:

Law: Held under the tenure described in A. 1.

" . . . all his copy-hold lands."—Addison.

¶ (1) Copyhold Commissioners: The title commissioners acting to carry out the Copyhold Act.

(2) Copyhold Inclosure Commissioners: A board formerly existing, but now joined with the tithe commissioners. (Wharton, &c.)

cop'-y-hold-er, s. [Eng. copyhold; -er.]

1. Law: One who holds land by the tenure of copyhold.

¶ Till the passing of the Act 6 Geo. IV., c. 50, § 1, copyholders were incapable of sitting on juries; and till 2 and 3 Wm. IV., c. 45, § 19 (the Reform Bill) became law, they were not allowed to vote at county elections of members of Parliament. Then those the annual value of whose copyhold was £10 obtained the privilege. Copyholds being the remains of feudal slavery, the tendency of recent legislation has been to sweep away vexatious restrictions upon the free action of copyholders, and Act 21 and 22 Vict., c. 94, which came into operation on Oct. 1, 1858, was designed to facilitate the enfranchisement of copyholds.

2. Printing: A clasp to hold copy while being set up; also a person who holds copy for a proof-reader.

cop'-y-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [COPY, v.]

A. As pr. par.: In senses corresponding to those of the verb.

B. As adj.: (See the compounds.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of making a copy of or transcribing an original; imitation of a pattern or model.

2. The act of transcribing the words, figures, &c., of another, with the intention of fraudulently passing them off as one's own.

copying-book, s. A book composed of thin blank paper for use in a copying-press (q.v.).

copying-clerk, s. A clerk employed to make copies of letters and other documents.

copying-ink, s. Ink of a viscid character specially prepared for use in a copying-press.

copying-instrument, s. A tracing instrument, or one for multiplying by manifold process. A silhouette-machine is one for giving, on a reduced scale, the outline of a shadow-portrait. A photograph is used for copying drawings on a changed scale.

copying-paper, s. Thin, unsized paper, used damp, for taking impressions from writings in a copying-press. (Knight.)

copying-press, s. A machine for taking a copy of a writing by pressure. The usual system is to write with an ink having a somewhat viscid character, and to expose the written page to pressure in contact with a leaf of bibulous paper. (Knight.)

copying-telegraph, s. An apparatus for automatic telegraphy known as Bonelli's telegraph. The apparatus consists of a dispatching instrument and a receiver at the respective ends of the line. (Knight.)

cop'-y-ist, s. [Eng. copy; -ist.]

1. One who copies or transcribes an original; a copier.

2. One who imitates in any way; one who follows a pattern or model; an imitator.

"Colossal copyist of deformity."—Byron: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, lv. 162.

cop'-y-right (gh silent), s. [Eng. copy, and right.]

Ord. Lang. & Law: The exclusive privilege possessed for a certain time by an author, his heirs or assigns, of printing, reprinting, publishing, and selling his original literary or artistic productions. In the United States authors, publishers, &c., can secure copyright for twenty-eight years; and the author, if living, or his widow or children, can then secure an extension of the copyright for fourteen years, making the final limit forty-two years. In Great Britain the first copyright law, that of 1710, fixed the time of copyright at fourteen years. In 1814 it was extended to twenty-eight years, and did not lapse till the author's death, if he still lived. By a later act the copyright was extended to forty-two years, with the additional proviso that it should not lapse till seven years after the author's death.

International copyright has long existed between some European countries, but was not established between the United States and other countries till 1891, despite the fact that the injustice and immorality of the existing system had long been generally recognized. The existing law went into effect July 1, 1891, with the provision that its benefits must be reciprocal, and also that the work on which copyright was sought must be manufactured within the United States. This provision was adopted for the benefit of American printers, and is not acceptable to authors. International copyright now exists between the United States and several other countries, and will, no doubt, become more general.

cop'-y-right (gh silent), v.t. [COPYRIGHT, s.] To secure the copyright of a book, &c., by fulfilling certain formalities.

coquelicot, coquelico (pron. kōk'-ll-ō), s. [Fr.]

1. The Wild Poppy or Red Corn-rose.

2. The colour of the Wild Poppy, a reddish-orange colour.

*cō-quet' (quet as kēt), s. [COQUETTE]

*cō-quet' (quet as kēt), v.t. & i. [Fr. "coqueter = to swagger or struts like a cock on his own dung-hill" (Cograve); from coq = a cock.]

A. Trans.: To entertain or ply with compliments and love-making; to pretend to make love to; to flirt with.

"You are coquetting a maid of honour, my lord, . . ."—Swift.

B. Intrans.: To endeavour through vanity to attract lovers, or at least admirers; to act the coquette; to flirt.

"I saw coquetting 't' other night, In publick, with that odious knight."—Swift: Cadogan & Femosa.

cō-quet-r'y, cō-quet-tr'y (quet as kēt), s. [Fr. coqueterie.] The acting the coquette; an endeavour, prompted by vanity, to attract lovers, or at least admirers; flirtation.

" . . . female companions, without a dash of coquetry."—Addison: Spectator.

cō-quet-ta (quet as kēt), s. [Etym. doubtful.] A term occurring only in the subjoined compound.

coquette bark, s.

Pharm.: A name given to fibrous Carthagen bark, from Cinchona lanceifolia, which grows in New Granada. It occurs in quills or flattened orange-coloured pieces; its powder is orange; it contains quinine, much quinidine, also some cinchonine. (Garrod: Mat. Medica.)

cō-quette' (quette as kēt), *cō-quet, s. & a. [Fr., from coqueter = to coquet (q.v.).]

A. As subst.: Originally applied to men as well as to women; now restricted to the latter. One who, prompted by vanity, endeavours by art to gain lovers, or at least admirers; a vain flirt, a jilt, one who lays herself out for admiration.

"The loveliest coquette to the brilliant Whitehall at the Restoration."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

*B. As adj.: Coquettish; full of or characterized by coquetry.

"Coquet and coy at once her air."—Congreve: Amoret.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between coquette and jilt: ". . . one may be a coquet without being a jilt. Coquetry is contented with employing little arts to excite notice; jilting extends to the violation of truth and honour, in order to awaken a passion which it afterwards disappoints. Vanity is the mainpring by which coquets and jilts are impelled to action, but the former indulges her propensity mostly at her own expense only; but the latter does no less injury to the peace of others than she does to her own reputation." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cō-quet-tēd (quet as kēt), pa. par. [COQUET, v.]

cō-quet-tīng (quet as kēt), pr. par., a., & s. [COQUET, v.]

coral insect, s. The inaccurate name given by many popular writers and speakers to the little animals which, aggregated in countless multitudes, rear the vast coral reefs so frequent in the tropics. These animals are, however, of lower organisation than insects. They should be called coral polypes, or coral zoophytes, or coral builders, or coral animals, but never coral insects. [ACTINOZOA.]

coral island, s. An island made in large measure of coral. Bermuda is an instance of the kind.

coral islet, s. An islet formed by corals.
 "... low, insignificant coral-islets . . ."
Darwin: Yogae round the World (ed. 1870), ch. ix., p. 460.

coral-mud, s. The mud produced by the decomposition of coral. It is carried some distance out to sea by currents. Lieutenant Nelson showed that the mud thus derived from the Bermudian coral reefs was undisturbable in appearance from chalk.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pit, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, ūnite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = a. qu = kw.

"... the lagoon . . . is nearly filled up with coral-mud."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (ed. 1870), ch. xx, p. 461.

coral polype, s. An anthozoon.

coral rag, s.

Geol.: A limestone of middle Oolitic age, so called because it consists in parts of continuous beds of fossil coral, for the most part retaining the position in which they grew at the bottom of the sea. Sometimes the mass is fifteen feet thick. Leading genera: Caryophyllia, Agaricia, and Astartea. The coral rag extends through the calcareous hills of the north-west of Berkshire and the north of Wiltshire, recurring at Scarborough in Yorkshire.

coral-reef, coral reef, s.

1. Ord. Lang. & Geol.: A reef consisting to a considerable extent, though not exclusively, of coral. The stony skeletons of zoophytes form large masses of limestone, and these, with shells, fragments of corals, &c. become cemented together by carbonate of lime, derived probably from the decomposition of dead corals. Sometimes there are masses of limestone with the very fracture of some of the secondary limestone; these could have been derived only from chemical precipitation. Mr. Darwin divides coral reefs into three kinds:—(1) the annular or lagoon reef, generally called an atoll, (2) the encircling or barrier reef, and (3) the fringing or skirting reef. The first two are found only where subsidence is in progress. For the construction of the first see ATOLL. An encircling reef, that is one encircling an island at some distance from the shore, is found in an area of subsidence where the central mountain or high land has not yet disappeared beneath the ocean. Allow time enough, with the continuance meanwhile of the present conditions, and the encircling reef will become an atoll. A barrier reef—the best known example of which is one running parallel to the north-east coast of Australia for 1,000 miles, 350 of them without a break, is a portion of what, if complete, would be an encircling reef. A fringing reef, close to the shores of a volcanic island, again is produced by the elevation of the area, which converted into dry land the narrow channel by which it was at one time separated from the shore. The Dangerous and Society Archipelagoes are areas of subsidence with atolls, as, it may be presumed, is the case with the Bermuda Islands, the only specimen in the Atlantic of an atoll. The great Australian barrier reef has already been mentioned. The New Hebrides, Solomon Island, and New Ireland afford examples of fringing reefs. Slow upheaval is in progress in that portion of the Pacific.

2. Palæont.: The reefs of Palæozoic times, if they be worthy of the name of reefs, were built up by Rugose Corals. From the Mesozoic times till now the chief reef-builders have been the families Astreidae, Poritidae, and Madreporidae, the Oculinidae and Fungia taking a lesser share in the work. Coral reefs are evidences of the proximity of land.

¶ Coral-reef region: The region where reef-bearing corals live. It extends only about 1,800 miles on each side from the equator, except in the case of Bermuda, which lies in the hot waters of the Gulf Stream; 66° or more is the temperature of the sea beneath which corals will not live.

coral-root, s.

Botany:

1. The book-name for the genus Corallorhiza, of which it is the literal translation.

2. Dentaria tubifera.

coral snakes, s. pl. Snake of the genus Eliapa. They occur in America. [ELAPS.]

"... the first coral-snake which I saw . . ."—Darwin: Descent of Man (1871), pt. II., ch. xii., vol. II., p. 51.

coral-tree, s. A name for Erythrina, a leguminous genus. The species occur in the tropics. The resemblance to red coral is in their blood-red flowers.

coral-wood, s. The wood of an unidentified American shrub which, yellow at first, is ultimately of coral red colour. It is susceptible of a fine polish.

coral-zone, s.

Zool.: A sea-zone in which corals abound.

¶ Deep-sea coral-zone:

Zool.: A zone from 50—100 fathoms deep, the fourth and last zone from the shore recognised by MM. Audouin and Milne-Edwards, M. Sars, and Prof. E. Forbes. The largest corals, such as Oculina and Primnoa, occur in it. The shells, Crania, Dentidium, &c., are mostly small and destitute of bright colours, but some are geologically antique.

* cōr'-al, v. t. [CORAL, s.] To make red like coral.

cōr-al-lā'-ceous (oe as ah), a. [Eng. coral, and adj. suff. -aceous.] Like or pertaining of the nature of coral.

cōr-al-lār'-ī-s, s. pl. [Lat. corallum, and pl. neut. adj. suff. aria.]
Zool.: The name given by Milne-Edwards to coral polypes.

* cōr'-alled, a. [Eng. coral; -ed.] Furnished or covered with coral.

cōr'-al-lēt, s. [Dimin. of Eng. coral.]

Zool.: The coralline of a single polype in a compound mass.

cōr-al-lif'-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. corallum = coral, fer(ō) = to bear, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Producing or containing coral.

cōr'-al-lif-form, a. [Lat. corallum = coral, and forma = form, appearance.]

Bot.: Resembling coral in form; branching and forked.

cōr-al-lig'-ēn-s, s. pl. [Gr. κοράλλιον (corallion) = coral, and γεννάω (gennāō) = to beget, to engender, the causal of γίγνομαι (gignomai) = to come into being.]

Zool.: An order of Actinozoa. (Huxley.) It contains the coral-forming Polypes.

cōr-al-lig'-ēn-ōūs, a. [Mod. Lat. coralligena (q.v.), and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Zool.: Producing a corallina. (Nicholson.)

¶ Coralligenous Zoophytes:

Zool.: An English name for the Madraporaria (q.v.).

cōr-al-lig'-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. corallum = coral, ger(ō) = to bear, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] The same as CORALLIFEROUS (q.v.).

cōr-al-lin, s. [Lat. corallinum = coral, and suff. -in (Chem.) (q.v.).]

Chem.: A red dye, prepared by the action of sulphuric and oxalic acids on phenol. It is also called aurin (q.v.) and rosolic acid (q.v.).

cōr-al-lī'-nā, s. [Lat. corallinus = coral (Med.), from Lat. corallum; Gr. κοράλλιον (corallion) = coral.]

Zool.: A genus of Algae, the typical one of the family Corallinaceæ (q.v.). They are stony in structure, and resemble corals, except that there are no animals projecting from the orifices of canals. Corallina officinalis is common on the British coast. It consists of a branched tuft of annulated filaments evenly coated with carbonate of lime. This can be removed by the application of vinegar or dilute muriatic acid, after which the plant can be sliced and examined like other Algae. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

cōr-al-lin-ā'-cē-ōs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. corallina, a. = a coralline, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceous.] [CORALLINA.]

Bot.: Florideous Algae. A family of Florideæ, consisting of rigid articulated or crustaceous seaweeds, mostly calcareous. When fresh they are purple, but become milk-white after exposure. The tetraspores are tufted, contained in oval or spheroidal conceptacles, with a terminal pore. The Corallinaceæ were formerly believed to belong to the animal kingdom, and were placed with the Zoophytes.

cōr'-al-līne, a. & s. [Lat. corallinus, from corallum.]

A. As adj.: Consisting of or containing coral; of the nature of or resembling coral.

"... in particular the coralline matter, . . ."—Woodward.

B. As substantive:

1. Zoology:

† (1) Loosely & inaccurately: A name for Corallina and its allies, then believed to be of an animal nature, and extended also so as to include the Bryozoa, Sertularia, and other zoophytes. Such was the use of the word by Ellis, and it is not yet extinct.

(2) Properly: The florideous algae included under the family Corallinaceæ (q.v.).

2. Palæont.: Corallines being calcareous are capable, when they become decomposed, of forming extensive accumulations of lime.

3. Colours: The same as CORALLINE COLOUR (q.v.).

¶ (1) Coralline colour: An orange-red colour prepared by the action of ammoniac, at about 800° Fahr., upon rosolic acid. (Ogilvie, ed. Annandale.)

(2) Coralline Crag:

Geol.: A division of the Suffolk Crag, distinguished superficially by its whits colour from the Red Crag, which constitutes the other division of the same series of beds. In the county where it has been best studied it is seldom more than twenty feet thick. It belongs to the Older Pliocene formation. The mollusca are very numerous, about sixty per cent. being recent species. The water in which it was deposited seems to have been deep and tranquil.

† (3) Coralline deposits:

Geol.: A name sometimes given to strata in large measure consisting of coral, and to presently existing reefs mainly the work of coral polypes. Whilst, however, the word deposit is quite accurate in such terms as "fluviatile deposits," "lacustrine deposits," &c., it is but partially correct when used of the construction of coral reefs. [CORAL REEFS.]

(4) Coralline zone:

Zool.: The third zone from the shore in the division of the sea-bed made by MM. Audouin, Milne-Edwards, M. Sars, and Prof. Edward Forbes. It extends from fifteen or twenty-five to thirty-five or fifty fathoms in depth. Horny Zoophytes abound in it; also various predatory genera of gastro-podous mollusca, such as Buccinum, Fucus, Natica, &c., with vegetable feeders, as Fissurella and Chemnitzia. There are also many bivalves of the genera Astarte, Venus, Arca, Nucula, Corbula, &c. The chief vegetable production is the Nullipora. (S. P. Woodward: Mollusca.)

cōr-al-lī-nē-ōs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. corallina, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -eas.]

Bot.: In Lindley's classification a tribe of the order Cerniceæ (Rose-tangles), and the sub-order Rhodomeleæ. Type, Corallina.

cōr'-al-līn-ēr-z, s. [Eng., &c. coralline; Ger. korallina, and erz = ore, metal.]

Min.: A curved lamellar mineral, the same as HEPATIC CINNABAR, a variety of Cinnabar. It is found in Idria.

† cōr'-al-līn-īte, s. [Eng., &c. coralline]; -ite (Palæont.) (q.v.).]

Palæont.: A fossil coralline.

* cō'-ral-līte, s. [Eng. coral; -ite.]

1. Palæont.: A fossil poly-pedon of a coral.

2. Zool.: The corallum secreted by an Actinozoon, which consists of a single polype, or the portion of a composite corallum secreted by an individual polype. (Nicholson.)

cōr-āl'-lī-ūm, s. [Lat. corallium; Gr. κοράλλιον (corallion) = coral.]

1. Zool.: A genus of Polypes, order Anthozoa. The sclerobasis, which is red and calcareous, is unjointed, but is branched. The canal system is filled with a nutrient fluid containing corpuscles and known as the "milk." The skeleton of Corallium rubrum is the Red Coral of commerce. [CORAL.]

2. Palæont.: It occurs in the Miocene, and has been supposed to have existed in the Jurassic and Cretaceous rocks.

cōr'-al-lōid, a. & s. [Gr. κοράλλιον (corallion) = coral, and εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

A. As adj.: Resembling coral.

"The . . . columnar, coralloid bodies, that are composed of plates set lengthways of the body, and passing from the surface to the axis of it."—Woodward: On Fossils.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=Z -cian, tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, çion = zhün. -tious, -sious, -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, deł.

B. As substantive:

- * 1. Zool.: An animal resembling a coral. Used of various Bryozoa.
- * 2. Geol.: The Coral Crag. (Ogilvie, ed. Annandale.)

cōr'-al-lōid'-al, a. [Eng. coralloid; -al.] Coralloid.
 "With many coralloidal concretions."—Brown: Volgar Errors, bk. II., ch. v.

cōr'-al-lō-rhī'-za, s. [Gr. κορῳλλιον (korallion) = coral, and ρίζα (rhiza) = a root.]

Bot.: A genus of Orchids with converging sepals, the lip of the corolla inferior, the spur adnate, with the ovary free; the pollen masses four, oblique to each other. Corallorhiza innata is the Spurless Corallorhiza. The root consists of thick interwoven fleshy fibres; the stem, greenish-white in colour, is 6—12 inches high, with small scale-like sheathing leaves; the lip of the corolla is oblong, its colour is white. It is found in parts of Scotland in marshy woods, or more rarely in sand; flowering in July.

cōr'-al-lō-rhī'-zī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. or Gr. corallorhiza, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Orchids, tribe Malaxæe. Type Corallorhiza.

cōr'-al-lūm, s. [Lat.]

Zool.: The hard structure deposited in or by the tissues of an actinozoan, commonly called a coral. (Nicholson.) [CORAL.]

cōr'-al-wōrt, s. [Eng. coral, and suff. -wort, so named from the appearance of the rhizome.]

Bot.: A book-name for Denaria bulbifera.

cōr'-am jū'-dī-çē, phrase. [Lat. coram = in presence of; judice (abl. of judex) = a judge.] Before or in presence of a judge.

cōr'-am nō'-bis, phrase. [Lat. coram, and nobis (abl. of nos) = us.] Before us, in our presence.

cōr'-am non jū'-dī-çē, phrase. [Lat. coram; non = not; judice (abl. of judex) = a judge.] Before one who has no jurisdiction.

cōr'-am par'-i-būs, phrase. [Lat. coram, and paribus (abl. pl. of par = equis).] Law: Before one's peers.

* coran, s. [CURRENT.]

* coran-tree, s. A currant-tree.

"The borders of which grass-plots are coran-trees"—Survey of Manor of Wimbledon, 1640. (DuVice.)

coranich, cronach, corinoch, corynoch, correnoth, s. [Gael. and Irish.]

1. A dirge or lamentation for the dead.
 "Cryand for yow the cairfull Corrinoch."
Fairings: Lindsay's Works, 1592, p. 208.
2. An alarm or war-cry.
 "Be he the Correnoth had done schout."
Bannatyns: Poems, p. 30.

cōr'-āx (pl. coraces), s. [Lat. corax; Gr. κόραξ (korax) = a raven, a crow. Named from the resemblance to a crow's beak.]

Palæont.: A provisional genus formed to include a certain form of extinct sharks' teeth, one of several types of teeth belonging to these fishes, found in the Cretaceous and earlier Tertiary deposits.

corb (1), s. [Lat. corbis = a basket.] A basket used for raising coal in collieries.

corb (2), s. [An abbreviation of corban (q.v.).]

corb (3), s. [An abbreviation of corbel (q.v.).] A corbel.
 "It was a bridge ybuilt in goodly wise
 With curious corbes and pendants graven faire."
Spenser: F. Q., IV. c. 6.

cōr'-bān, s. [Gr. κορβάν (korban), which is a Greek transliteration of Heb. קֹרְבָן (qorban) = a gift, offering, or oblation to God.] Used specially of offerings given in fulfilment of a vow. In the Old Testament corban occurs in the original in Lev. ii. 1, 4, 12, 14; vii. 13, 25; ix. 7, 15; Num. v. 15; vii. 10, 11; ix. 13; xviii. 9; xxxi. 50; Ezek. xx. 28; xl. 43. It is not found except in these three books, but an analogous word with the same meaning, קֹרְבָן (qurban), is in Neh. x. 35, and xiii. 31.

"... It is Corban, that is to say, a gift."
Mark vii. 11. (Cf. also Matt. xv. 4—6.)

¶ The meaning is more clearly brought out in the Revised Version, "... but ye say, If a man shall say, Given to God, he no longer suffer him to do ought for his father or mother, making void the word of God by your tradition which ye have delivered." The persons denounced, being deficient in natural affection, sought a method of escaping from the duty of supporting their poorer parents. They made a pretended dedication to God of the money which should have been used for the purpose; and those who hoped to profit by the transaction approved of the deed.

* corbe, * courbe, a. [Fr. courbe.] Crooked.

* corbed (Eng.), * corbit (Scotch), a. [Eng. corb(e); -ed.] Crooked in disposition, crabbed.
 "Canker'd, curst creature, crabbit, corbit, kittle."
Matilda's Satyr: Watson's Coll., II. 64.

cōr'-beil, s. [Fr. corbelle, from Lat. corbicula, dimin. of corbis = a basket.]

1. Arch.: A sculptured basket with carved flowers and fruits.

2. Fortif.: A small basket filled with earth and set upon parapets, to shelter men from the fire of besiegers.

cōr'-bēl (1), * cor-ball, * cor-bil, s. [O.]

Fr. corbel, from Low Lat. corbella = a little basket; Lat. corbis = a basket, a pannier; Ital. corbella; Fr. corbeau.]

Arch.: A form of bracket used in Gothic architecture for the purpose of supporting the ends of timbers, arches, parapets, floors, cornices, &c. It consists of a projecting block of stone, usually carved in a fantastic manner, and having a receding face. (Knight.)
 "The corbells were carved grotesque and grim."
Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, II. 9.

CORBEL.

corbel-piece, s.

cōr'-bis, s. [Lat. corbis = a basket.]

Zool.: A genus of conchiferous Molluscs, family Lucinidæ. It has an oval, ventricose, subequilateral, concentrically sculptured shell, the margins denticulated within, two huge teeth and two lateral teeth in each valve, and a simple pallial line. Five recent species are known and eighty fossil, the latter from the Liass onward till now. (Woodward: Mollusca, ed. Tate.)

* cor-bit, a. [CORBED.]

cor-bond, s. [Etym. unknown.]

Mining.: An irregular mass of copper from the lode.

cor-bū-lār'-ī-a, s. [Lat. corbula = a little basket, and n. pl. suff. -aria. Named from the shape of the necky.]

Bot.: A genus of Amariyllidæe. The species are generally called Hoop-petticoats. They are found in the south of Europe. The best-known species is Corbularia Bulbocodium, the Common Hoop-petticoats; it has pale yellow flowers.

cor'-bý, cor'-bie, a. [Fr. corbeau; Lat. corvus = a crow.] A raven or crow.

"... and these corbies dinna gather without they andil carrion."
Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xviii.

corbie messenger, corbie's messenger, s. One who is long upon his errand, or who, like the raven sent from the Ark, returns not again.
 "... his Majesty alledging that I was Corbie's Messenger."
Maitell: Mem., p. 170.

corbie-oats, s. A species of black oats.

corbie-steps, s. pl.

Arch.: A corruption of corbel-steps (q.v.). From this corruption, and the fact that corbie in Scotch a raven or crow, has arisen the still further corruption of crow-steps, a term which has been actually explained by some as derived from the fact that crows are fond of sitting on them!

Dunbar: Bannatyns Poems, p. 84, st. 4.

cōr'-chō-rūs, s. [Lat. corchorus; Gr. κόρροπος (korchoros) = a sorry vegetable growing wild; Pimpernel or Jews' Mallow.]

Bot.: A genus of hypogynous exogens, order Filices, sub-order Filices, family Grewidæ. The species are herbs or small shrubs. Leaves simple, flowers single or in clusters, inserted opposite to the leaves; sepals, five deciduous; petals, five; stamens, many; style, one; stigmas, five. Fruit capsular or pod-like, separating into five divisions. About fifty species are known. The leaves of Corchorus olitorius are used in Egypt and the adjacent countries as a potherb. From the fact that the Jews thus employ them they are sometimes called Jews' Mallow. Fishing-lines and nets, "gunny," i.e., rice bags, and "tat," a coarse kind of linen, have long been made in India from C. capsularis, but it is much

A. As subst.: Spanish leather from Cordova.

"His schoone of cordewane."—Chaucer: The Tale of Sir Thopas, 15, 143.

B. As adj.: Made of Spanish leather.

cor-dy-a, a. [Named by Plumier after E. Cordus, a German botanist of the sixteenth century.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Cordiaceæ (q.v.). The corolla, which is funnel-shaped or campanulate, has a flat 5-7 cleft limb; the stamens are 5; the style bifid, with 4 stigmas; the ovary 3-4 celled; drupe 1 or 3 celled, only 1 perfect; seed 1. The fruit is succulent, mucilaginous, and emollient. That of Cordia Myxa and C. latifolia is eaten by the natives of India, as are the drupes of C. abyssinica by the Abyssinians, who call it wanze or vanze. The wood of C. Myxa is said to have furnished the wood from which the Egyptians made their mummy cases. The bark is a mild tonic. C. Rumphii has a brown black-veined wood smelling of musk, and C. Gerasacanthus, the "Spanish elm" of the West Indies, has also a wood of economic value. About 200 species of cordia are known. [CORDIACEÆ.]

cor-dy-ä-që-së, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. cordia, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: An order or sub-order of perigynous exogens, alliances Solanales. It is most closely akin to the Boraginaceæ, and next to the Convolvulaceæ. It consists of trees with alternate harsh scabrous exstipulate leaves; calyx inferior 4-5 toothed; corolla monopetalous 4-7 cleft; stamens 4-6; ovary 4-8 celled, each with 1 pendulous ovule. Fruit, a drupe 4-8 celled. The species are found in the tropics of both hemispheres, in South America straggling into more temperate latitudes. In 1845, Lindley enumerated eleven genera, and estimated this known species at böil, böy; pöut, jöwi; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -üng. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tions, -sions, -cions = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

180. But 200 species of Cordia itself are now known. Mr. Carruthers, F.R.S., makes the Cordiaceae a sub-order of Boraginaceae.

cor-di-al, *cor-di-all, a. & s. [Fr. & Sp.; Ital. cordiale; Low Lat. cordialis = pertaining to the heart, from Lat. cor (genit. cordis) = the heart.]

"... this hypothesis is sore to be dissipated if it possess not a core of truth."—Tyndall: Prog. of Science (3rd ed.), vii, 16d.

2. The innermost or deepest part of anything; the essence.

"As I approach the core of my heart's grief."—Byron: Manfred, II, 2.

* 3. A centre or central part.

"In the core of the square she raised a tower of a furious high."—Raleigh: Hist. of the World.

B. Technically:

1. Arch. & Masonry: The inner portion or filling of a wall.

2. Founding:

(1) An internal mould which forms the interior of a cylinder, tube, pipe, faucet, or other hollow casting. It is made of various proportions of new sand, loam, and horse-dung. It requires to be thoroughly dried, and when containing horse-dung must be burned to a red-heat, to consume the straw. This makes it porous and of a brick-red colour. The core is made in a core-box, and has projecting portions, known as core-prints, which rest in the prints of the mould. The model from which the object is cast is solid, and makes an impression, partly in the cope and partly in the drag. When the pattern is removed, the core is laid in its place, the projecting portions resting in the recesses made by the prints of the pattern. Touching the loam of the mould at no other point, it occupies, in the case of a pipe, a central position in the space which is to be run full of metal. When the metal has been poured around it and then cooled, the core is broken out, leaving the casting hollow. Simple cores are those which do not prevent the delivery of the cope and drag, that is, which have no undercut portion which would prevent the portions of the flask from being parted in the usual way.

(2) A central piece occupying an axial position within a circular aperture at which clay or lead exudes in the process of making earthenware or leaden pipes. The core gives the inside shape to the pipe. (Knight.)

3. Surgery: The heart or innermost part of an ulcer or boil.

"Launce the core,
And cut the head; for, till the core be found,
The secret vice is fed, and gathers ground."
—Dryden: Virgil.

4. Veterinary: A disease in sheep caused by worms in the liver.

5. Submarine Telegraphy: The conducting wires in the heart of the cable. They are twisted in a spiral strand and covered with several layers of gutta-percha, between each of which is a coating of Chatterton's compound—a mixture of tar, resin, and gutta-percha. (Gaout.)

6. Electro-magnetism: A solid bar of iron around which a helix or spiral is wound.

"... the cores of electro-magnets."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. x, p. 60.

7. Rope-making: The central strand around which four other strands are twisted in a shroud hawser-laid rope.

8. Hydr. Eng.: A wall or structure absolutely impervious to water, placed in an embankment or dike to prevent the percolation of water, which may penetrate the porous material of which the remainder of the dike is composed. The core may be of puddle or a wall laid in hydraulic cement. (Knight.)

core-bar, s. The bar or spindle which supports the core of a shell.

core-box, s. A divisible box in which clay is rammed to form cores.

CORE-BOX PLANE.

Core-box plane: A peculiar form of plane which has a cutting tooth projecting below the sole, to plough grooves in the parts of a core-box. It is commonly known among carpenters as "the old woman's tooth."

core-print, s. A projecting piece on a pattern for moulding, to form a hole in the mould to receive the end of the core by which it is sustained in the mould in proper position relatively to the object cast. (Knight.)

core-valve, s. A plug-valve which has a rotary reciprocation in a cylindrical or hollow conical seat, occupying about the same relative position to its seat as the core of a faucet does to the casting itself.

* core (2), s. [Fr. corps = body, or a form of choir (q.v.)]

- 1. A body.
- 2. A party, clan, or company.

"... he was in a core of people..."—Bacon: Hen. VII., p. 17.

¶ In core: In company or concert.

"Dukes, and geese, and hens, in core Raid'd their discordant voices."
—D. Anderson: Poems, p. 81, 84.

core (3), s. [CHORE, CHAIR.]

Mining: The turn or shift, that is, the number of hours during which each party of miners work at a time, generally six to eight hours.

cō-rēc'-tōme, cō-rē'-tōme, s. [Gr. κόρη (korē)=the pupil of the eye, and ἐκτομή (ektomē)=a cutting out.] An instrument for cutting through the iris to form an artificial pupil; an iridectome (q.v.).

* cō-rēc'-tōr, s. [CORRECTOR.]

cored, pa. par. or a. [CORE, v.]

* cō-rē-ġent, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. regent (q.v.)] A joint ruler or governor.

"Joseph was... co-regent of Hungary and Bohemia."—Fraxell: Berlin, II, 483.

cō-rēġ-ōn'-īis, s. [Of uncertain etym.]

Ichthy.: A genus of abdominal fishes, family Salmoidae. The teeth are very small or wanting, the scales very large, the height or front of the first dorsal greater than its breadth. Yarrell enumerates four British species—(1) Coregonus fera, the Gwyniad of Wales, the Schilly of Ullswater, where it abounds; (2) C. willughbi, the Vendace; (3) C. lacepedii, the Powan; and (4) C. Pollan, the Pollan. There are many American species, popularly known as whitefish.

cōr-ē-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. κόρις (koris) = a bug, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of bugs, the same as COREODEA (q.v.).

* cō-rēign'-ēr (g silent), s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. reign (q.v.)] One who reigns jointly with another.

"... the co-governors and co-reigners with the Supreme God."—Cudworth: Intellectual System, p. 246.

cō-rē-lā'-tion, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. relation (q.v.)] Corresponding relation.

cō-rēl'-at-īve, a. [CORRELATIVE.]

† cōre'-lēss, a. [Eng. core; -less.]

- 1. Lit.: Having no core.
  - 2. Fig.: Weak, without pith or stamina.
- "I am gone in years... coreless and sapless."
—Taylor: Isaac Commensal, II, 1.

cō-rē-lī-ġiōn'-īst, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. religionist (q.v.)] One of the same religion.

"... their object seems to have been to help their co-religionists..."—Daily Telegraph, March 4, 1882.

cō-rē-mā, s. [Gr. κόρημα (korēma) = . . . a besom, a broom, so called from the habit of the plant.]

Bot.: A genus of Empetraceæ. The only known species, Corema alba, is called the Portugal Crakeberry.

cōr-ē-ō-dē-a, s. [Gr. κόρις (koris) = a bug, and εἶδος (eidōs) = form, appearance.]

Entom.: A sub-tribe of Hemipterous Insects. They have four-jointed antennæ high on the head, scutellum small and triangular, many nervures in the hemelytral membrane. Found in hot and in temperate climates, some of the species inhabiting the former being large and of grotesque form. The British species are small. (Dallas). [CORISIA.]

cōr-ē-ōp-sīd'-ō-sē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coreopsis (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of Composite plants, tribe Senecionideæ. Genera, Coreopsis, Helianthus, &c.

cōr-ē-ōp'-sīs, s. [Gr. κόρις (koris) = a bug, and ὄψις (opsis) = appearance, aspect. Named from the resemblance which its two-horned pappus has to the antennæ of a bug or other insect.]

Bot.: A genus of Composite plants, the type of the sub-tribe Coreopsideæ (q.v.). The seeds are flat on one side and convex on the other. The species are American, but several are cultivated in European gardens. The flowers of Coreopsis verticillata are used in the United States to dye cloth red.

cōr'-ēr, s. [Eng. cor(e); -er.] An instrument for extracting the core from the fruit.

cōr'-ē-sēs, s. pl. [Etyml. doubtful.]

Bot.: Dark-red broad discoid bodies found beneath the epicarp of grapes. (Treas. of Bot.)

* coresur, s. [COURSER.]

cō-rē-spōnd'-ent, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. respondent (q.v.)]

Law: One who is made a joint respondent with another in a suit; especially in the Divorce Court, a man who is charged by the plaintiff with adultery with his wife, and made a party to the suit for dissolution of marriage.

* coresy, s. [CORSY, CORROSIVE, s.]

cōr-ē-thrō-sty'-īis, s. [Gr. κόρηθρον (korēthron) = a broom, in allusion to the very hairy style.]

Bot.: A genus of Byttneriaceæ, tribe Lasiopetalæ. The genus consists of Australian bushes. Corethrostylis bracteata is a common bush, with pink flowers and bracts of the same colour, sometimes seen in greenhouses.

corf, * corfe, s. [Lat. corbis = a basket.] [CORB.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A basket used in carrying coals; a corb, a corve.

* 2. A basket of any kind.

"Ane corf full of apillis, . . ."—Aberd. Reg., A. 1543, v. 18.

* 3. Basket-work in silver.

"Item, twa round tabillis of gold within ane corf of silver wyre."—Inventories (A. 1842), pp. 62, 63.

* 4. A measure or quantity of fish.

"Ane thousand corf kayling in peyll."—Aberd. Reg., A. 1541, v. 17.

* 5. A temporary dwelling, a shed.

"And with that wurd Istit a corf he cap, Fra hair weddir, and frostis, him to hap."
—Bannatyne Poems, p. 114.

II. Mining:

1. A basket to carry coal or ore; a corve.

2. A square frame of wood to carry coals on.

3. A sled or low-wheeled wagon in a mine, to convey coal or ore from the miners to the bottom of the shaft. (Knight.)

* corf-house, * corfe-house, * corff-house, s. A house or shed erected for the purpose of curing salmon and to keep the nets in during the close season.

"To be let.—The salmon-fishings in the river Awe, near Oban, in Argyshire, — with the corf-houses, shades, &c. belonging thereto."—Edin. Even. Courant, April 21, 1804.

* corf, v.t. [CORF, s.] To prepare fish by boiling them in salt and water.

Cor'-fī-ōte, Cor' fūte, s. [From Corfu, one of the Ionian Islands.] An inhabitant or native of Corfu.

* corft, pa. par. or a. [CORF, v.]

cōr'-ī-ā-çē-ōūs, a. [Lat. coriaceus, from corium = leather.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Consisting or made of leather.

2. Of a substance resembling leather; tough.

"... thence perhaps speltitude and coriaceous concretion."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments.

II. Bot.: Stiff like leather or parchment.

Example, the leaves of the box or of the holly.

cōr'-ī-a-mŷr'-tīn, s. [Lat. coria(ria); mŷr-tifolia]; and suff. -in.]

Chem.:  $C_{26}H_{32}O_{10}$ . The active principle of Coriaria myrtifolia (q.v.). It crystallizes in white, bitter, rhomboidal prisms, melting at 220°, slightly soluble in water, easily soluble in boiling alcohol and ether.

cōr-i-ān-dēr, *collaundre, s. [Dan. coriander; Sw., Dut., & Ger. koriander; Fr. coriandre; Ital. coriandro, coriandolo, all from Lat. coriandrum (q.v.).]

1. Ord. Lang. & Bot.: An umbelliferous plant, Coriandrum sativum. It has an erect, leafy stem, the lower leaves bipinnate, the upper more divided, the uppermost of all nearly setaceous. Fruit globose, nearly undivided, with ten obscure lines or ribs. It is occasionally found in the South of England in fields and waste places, but is not truly indigenous to Britain. It has escaped from cultivation. It is a native of Southern Europe and the Levant.

"And coriander last to these succeeds. That hangs on allbest threads her trembling seed." Cowper: Translations from Virgil; The Salad.

2. Scip.: The word occurs in Exod. xvi. 31, and Num. xi. 7. It is the rendering of the Hebrew word קָדַי (gad), and the translation is probably correct, for Celsus says that yois (gold) is coriander.

"... it was like coriander seed, white..."—Exod. xvi. 31.

* coriander-seed, s. A jocular term for money.

"... the spaukers, spur-royals, rose-nobles, and other coriander seed with which she was quilled all over."—Dell: Nabobs, bk. IV., ch. 15., p. 125.

cōr-i-ān-dri-dēs, s. pl. [Lat. coriandrum, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -dēs.]

Bot.: A family of plants belonging to the order Apiceae (Umbellifers).

cōr-i-ān-drūm, s. [Lat. = coriander, from Gr. koriannon (Koriannon) = the plant coriander or its seed.]

1. Bot.: Coriander, a genus of umbelliferous plants, the type of the family Coriandridae. No general involucre, partial involucre on one side; petals obcordate, with an inflated point, the outer ones radiant; carpels closely cohering; the ribs obsolete, interstices prominent without vittae. Coriandrum sativum is the Coriander (q.v.).

2. Pharm.: Coriandri fructus, the dried ripe fruit of Coriandrum sativum. It is globular, nearly as large as white pepper, beaked, finely ribbed, yellowish-brown, having an agreeable aromatic odour and taste. Coriander is a stimulant, aromatic carminative. It is used in the preparation of Confectio Sennae, Mistura Gentianae, Sympus Rhei, Tinctura Rhei, and Tinctura Sennae. When distilled with water, bruised coriander fruit yields yellow oil, which is a mixture of several oils; the coriander oil is aromatic, and has the same therapeutic properties as the seeds.

cōr-i-ār-i-a, s. [Lat. neut. pl. of coriarius = leathery, from corium = skin, hide, leather.]

1. Bot.: A genus of hypogynous exogens, consisting of shrubs with opposite branches, or, in some cases, having on each side one principal branch and two secondary ones. Leaves opposite ribbed, entire; inflorescence terminal and axillary racemes; calyx campanulate, five-parted; petals five, smaller than the lobes of the calyx, fleshy, keeled; stamens ten; carpels five or six, arranged around a thickish gynobase; stigmas five; ovules solitary pendulous; fruit crustaceous. Found in Europe, South America, Nepaul in Asia, and New Zealand. Coriaria myrtifolia and ruscifolia are used to dye black. Their fruit and leaves are poisonous. The latter have been used to adulterate opium, and with fatal effect. The fruit of C. nepalensis is eaten. The C. sarmentosa of New Zealand has poisonous seeds, but the pulp is less deleterious, or perhaps even harmless.

2. Chem.: A greenish-red substance, contained in Coriaria ruscifolia. It is very poisonous.

cōr-i-ār-i-ā-ō-ō-ē, s. pl. [Lat. coriaria, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -ō-ē.]

Bot.: An order of hypogynous exogens, formed to include the solitary and anomalous genus Coriaria.

cōr-i-ār-i-ē-ē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coriaria, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -ē-ē.]

Bot.: A tribe of plants formed to include Coriaria. (Lindley.) By some it is elevated into an order, Coriariaceae (q.v.).

cōr-id-in, s. [Lat. corium = leather, d connective, and Eng. suff. -in (Chem.); or Gr.

eidos (eidos) . . . appearance (?), and suff. -in (Chem.)]

Chem.: C<sub>10</sub>H<sub>16</sub>N. A base occurring in coal oil and in tobacco smoke. It is a colourless liquid, having a smell like new leather. Coridin boils at 211°. It gives a yellow-red colour with bleaching powder, which is destroyed by acids.

* cōr-i-ēr, *coriour, *coryowre, s. [CURRIER.]

"Coryowra. Cortarius, arda."—Prompt. Parv.

* cōr-ige, v.t. [Lat. corrigo.] [CORRECT, a.] To correct, to set right, to chastise.

"Any man might think that the masters of shroves ben corriged and chastised by vengeance, . . ."—Chaucer: Boecius, bk. 17.

cōr-in, s. [An African negro word.]

Zool.: It is a species of gazelle, or perhaps only a variety of the common one.

* cō-rin-dōn, s. [Various Mod. India languages corund, from Sansc. kururinda = the ruby cinnabar.]

Min.: An old name for a mineral genus, containing sapphire, corundum, and emery.

Cōr-inth, a. [Lat. Corinthus; Gr. Κόρινθος (korinthos), a famous city of Greece, situated on the isthmus of the same name. It was noted for the licentiousness and extravagance of its inhabitants, and also for its public buildings.]

I. Literally:
1. The city named in the etymology.

* 2. A currant (q.v.).
"Now will the corinths, now the rasps supply Delicious drange." J. Phillips: Cider, ll.
* II. Fig.: A bawdy-house.

* Cō-rin'-thi-āo, a. [Eng. Corinth; -iac.] Of or pertaining to Corinth; Corinthian.

Cō-rin'-thi-an, a. & s. [Eng. Corinth; -ian.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Of or pertaining to Corinth.

2. Fig.: Licentious, dissipated, wild.

"... all her young Corinthian laity, . . ."—Milton: Apol. for Smectymna.

II. Arch.: A term applied to an order of architecture. It is the most delicate and elaborate of all the orders. Like the Ionic, from which, indeed, it differs little, it consists of stylobate, column, and entablature. The stylobate is more ornate. The proportions are more slender, and the individual parts more rich and elegant. The column is fluted. The capital has generally the form of an expanded calyx, and is ornamented with acanthus leaves and scrolls. The column is ten diameters in height. The abacus is square.

"Behind these figures are large columns of the Corinthian order, adorned with fruit and flowers."—Dry.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A native of Corinth.

* 2. Fig.: A debauchee; a licentious character; a wench.

"... a Corinthian, a lad of mettle, a good boy, . . ."—Shakep.: 1 Hen. IV., ll. 4.

II. Scripture canon:

St. Paul's First and Second Epistles to the Corinthians: Two well-known epistles forming part of the New Testament.

(1) Corinth and its Church: Corinth was a celebrated city, situated on the isthmus separating the Peloponnesus from the mainland of Greece, and with a lofty and extensive citadel, the Acrocorinthus, keeping watch over the security of the plain below. The Isthmian games were held in the vicinity. Commerce had made the city wealthy, and wealth had rendered it corrupt. Courtesans swarmed in it everywhere, and the Greek verb κορινθιάζομαι (korinthiazomai) meant to commit impurity of a gross kind. Some improvement had taken place since the old Greek city had given way to the Roman one founded by Julius Caesar; but still the moral reputation of the place was low. It, however, stood high intellectually. Two visits of the Apostle paid to Corinth, are described in the Acts of the Apostles. During the first of these residences in Corinth, which continued for about eighteen months, from A.D. 51 to A.D. 53, he founded the Christian Church there, the majority of the converts being Gentiles (Acts xviii.

1-18). Afterwards the eloquent Apollos took up the work (Acts xix. 1). The second recorded visit from St. Paul to Greece, doubtless including Corinth, continued three months (Acts xx. 3); but an unrecorded visit seems also to have been made (2 Cor. xii. 14, xiii. 1). There is some reason to believe that there may also have been an epistle, now lost, earlier than the two which form part of the canon (1 Cor. v. 9).

(2) The two canonical epistles to the Corinthians: The external and internal evidence that these two epistles emanated from St. Paul is so strong that it convinced even the sceptical mind of Dr. Ferdinand Christian Baur, who, allowing only four of the epistles attributed to St. Paul to have been really his, placed the two to the Corinthians among the four. The four were Galatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Romans, and the order in which they are now given is that in which, in his view, they were issued at first. The probable date of the two epistles to the Corinthians is A.D. 57; the first having been written from Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 8), and the second a few months later from Macedonia (2 Cor. i. 16, viii. 1, ix. 4, xl. 9). The subtlety of the Greek mind and other causes had produced divisions in the Church of Corinth, and four parties had arisen, one of Paul, one of Apollos, one of Cephas, and one of Christ. The first doubtless believed in the high apostolic dignity of St. Paul, and being mainly Gentile, approved of his casting off the burdensome yoke of Judaism. The party of Cephas, consisting of Judaizing Christians, depreciated the authority of St. Paul, representing his call to the apostleship as late in time and abnormal in character. The party of Apollos was probably in its essence Pauline, but with more of that wisdom of the world which Paul had ignored at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 18-24). The party of Christ may have begun by professing to rise above all sects and ended by becoming itself sectarian. Besides these parties and the lack of Christian love which they produced, there were other matters for censure. A case of incest had been discovered, yet the perpetrator of the offence had been allowed to remain in the Church. Grave irregularities had also arisen in connexion with the Holy Communion. There was serious error too in doctrine, the future resurrection of the dead being called in question by some. The Apostle in the First Epistle combats these errors with great eloquence and power. In his Second Epistle he welcomes back to the fold the now penitent delinquent whose expulsion he had counselled, and anew vindicates his apostolic authority.

Corinthian brass, s. An alloy of gold, silver, and copper, so called from the fact that at the burning of Corinth many statues made of these metals were melted together. (Weale.) [BRASS.]

* coriour, s. [CURRIER.]

cō-rī-a, s. [Gr. κόρις (koris) = a bug . . . & plant—a kind of St. John's-wort. This is not the modern botanical genus Coris.]

Bot.: A genus of perigynous exogens; order Primulaceae, family Primulidæ. It is a branched herbaceous shrub, with alternate linear coriaceous leaves; flowers in dense terminal spiked racemes, and globose capsules with five valves and five seeds. Coris monspeliensis, dried and reduced to powder, was used by the Spanish monks as a vulnerary. It has also been given in syphilis.

cōr-i-ūm, s. [Lat. = leather.]

* I. A kind of body armour, composed of scales or small plates of leather, worn by the Roman soldiers.

2. Anat. & Zool.: The cutis vera, or true skin, the innermost layer of the skin in mammals. It is defended by the non-vascular cuticle. It is composed of interlaced connective tissue with blood-vessels and lymphatics. Its thickness is from a quarter of a line to a line and a half.

* cō-rī-val, * cor-rī-val, s. & a. [Pra. co = con, and Eng. rival (q.v.).]

A. As subst.: A competitor, a rival in any pursuit or object.

"... a competitor and rival with the king for the hearts and attentions of the people."—Bacon: Charge at the Seas for the Verge.

B. As adj.: Rivalling, emulating; acting as a rival or competitor.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīno; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē. ey = a. qu = kw.

*co-ri-val, *cor-ri-val, v.t. [CORIVAL, s.] To rival, to emulate.

"... where's then the sancy boat
Whose weak untimber'd sides but even now Corival'd greatness?"
Shaksp.: Troil. & Cress., l. 2

*co-ri-val-ry, *cor-ri-val-ry, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. rivalry (q.v.).] The quality or state of being a corival with another; rivalry, emulation.

"... this idolatrous corivalry, . . ."—Mors: Expos. of the Seven Churches (1669), Pref.

*co-ri-val-ship, s. [Eng. corival; -ship.] Rivalry, corivalry.

"... the corivalship of Shaged his false friend,
. . ."—Sir T. Herbert: Travels, p. 149.

*co-ri-val-ty, *corrivaltie, s. [Eng. corival; -ty.] Corivalry, competition.

"... a corrivaltie with the written word."—Ep. Hall: The Old Religion, ch. xvi, l. 5.

*co-ri-ve, v.t. [For corival (q.v.).] To be a rival or competitor with another.

"It lesser greeteth he should grudge That I with him co-ri-ve."
Warner: Albion's England, bk. III, ch. xvi.

cork (1), *corkie, s. & a. [Sp. corcho; Dut. kurk; Dan. & Sw. kork = cork, from Lat. cortex = bark.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II.

(2) A small stopper for a bottle or cask, made of the substance described in II.

"Prior had passed his boyhood in drawing corks at a tavern, . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

(3) The float used by anglers.

* 2. Figuratively:

(1) A cant term for an overseer, a steward. (Scotch.)

(2) A name given by operative weavers to the agents of manufacturers. (Scotch.)

II. Technically:

1. Botany & Commerce:

(1) Spec.: The outer layer of bark of the Cork Oak (Quercus Suber). It is a very elastic tissue consisting of thin-walled nearly cubical cells. It does not peel off, but often contains long clefts. It forms a protection to the sub-jacent cells from injurious influences.

(2) Gen.: The suberous layer of the bark of other trees when greatly developed.

2. Chem.: Cork twice boiled with alcohol about 10 per cent. dissolved. The extract deposited Cerin, C<sub>17</sub>H<sub>32</sub>O, a white substance melting at 100°, then an amorphous acid melting at 86°, called decaric acid, C<sub>16</sub>H<sub>32</sub>O<sub>2</sub>; afterwards, on further evaporation, a fatty substance melting at 150° was deposited, called eulysin, C<sub>27</sub>H<sub>50</sub>O<sub>2</sub>. The remainder of the liquid, evaporated to dryness, left a mass which, repeatedly boiled with water, yielded to that liquid a tannic acid, separating from the aqueous solution in dark red flocks. Its solution forms with gelatine a yellow, with tartar emetic a brown, precipitate, and reduces an ammoniacal silver solution in the cold. Potash and ammoniac colour its solution red, baryta water gives a dark coloured precipitate. The calcium salt has the formula (C<sub>27</sub>H<sub>50</sub>O<sub>2</sub>)<sub>2</sub>Ca + 8H<sub>2</sub>O. The aqueous extract when further evaporated deposited a red-brown precipitate called corticio acid. The portion insoluble in water of the residue obtained by evaporating the original alcoholic extract had nearly the appearance of the original cork substance; it dissolved easily and almost completely in boiling alcohol, and partly separated on cooling as a jelly. Its alcoholic solution evaporated on paper, and penetrated the paper like fat. The portion of cork insoluble in alcohol is called suberin, which is a modified form of cellulose. Cork oxidised with nitric acid yields oxalic, suberic, and ceric acids. (Watts: Dict. Chem., &c.)

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or made of cork.

"When you fish, thus, — use a large cork-float, . . ."—Walton: Angler, pt. I, ch. xii.

¶ Mountain cork:

Mfn.: A variety of asbestos light enough to swim on water. It is found in veins in serpentine. It occurs in Scotland, Norway, Saxony, Spain, &c.

* cork-brained, * corkbrained, a. Empty, or light-headed.

"Why you shall see an upstart corkbrained Jacko Will bear five hundred akers on his back."
J. Taylor: Works.

* cork-brains, s. An empty or light-headed fellow.

"... some giddy-headed corkbrains . . ."—Taylor: Works (1830). (Nares.)

cork-clasp, s. A wire attached to the neck of a bottle, and holding down the cork. (Knight.) cork-cutter, s.

1. One whose trade is the cutting of cork for various purposes.

2. A machine for cutting corks for bottles.

Cork-cutter's knife: A knife with a very thin and sharp blade about six inches long and tapering, with a truncated end. It is constantly whetted upon the board from which rises the stake on which the cork rests during cutting. (Knight.)

cork-faucet, s. A faucet adapted to be inserted through a cork, to draw the contents of a bottle. [BOTTLE-FAUCET.] (Knight.) cork-jacket, s. A jacket lined with cork for the purpose of sustaining the wearer on the surface of the water.

cork-machine, s. A machine which produces a cleanly cut cork, usually of cylindrical form, the tapering form being afterwards given by pressure. The knife of the machine cuts a perfect arc; the machine drops the cork into one receptacle and the shavings into another, and the hone instantly sharpens the knife for farther work. (Knight.)

cork-press, s. A press in which a cork, previously wetted, is rendered elastic, to enable it the more readily to enter the neck of a bottle. In one form, the cork is placed between the serrated surfaces of the cone and the eccentric cam, and pressed to a less or greater extent by a partial rotation of the latter. Another form is a lever press with jaws.

cork-pull, s. A substitute for a cork-screw, having hooks or fangs which clasp a cork when in the bottle and draw it thence. The jaws, while collapsed by the slide, are passed through the neck of the bottle, and, being opened, are then clasped around the cork by the motion of the slide, and the cork with its retractor is drawn from the bottle. (Knight.) cork-tissues, s. pl.

Bot.: The vegetable tissues of which cork is composed. (See the extract.)

"In direct contrast to the generating tissues are the healing-tissues, suberous tissues or cork-tissues . . . Two kinds of the tissue are distinguished, true cork or suber, and periderm . . ."—Thomé: Bot. (transl. by Bennett, 1879), p. 42.

cork-tree, s.

Bot.: The tree, Quercus Suber, from which cork is derived. It grows in Spain through the whole extent of the Tierra Caliente, but is most abundant in Catalonia and Valencia.

cork-wood, s.

Bot.: Anona palustris.

¶ (1) New South Wales Cork-wood: Duboisia myoporoides.

(2) West Indian Cork-wood: Ochroma Lagopus.

cork (2), cor-kin, kor-ker, s. [Gael. corcar = the Lichen tartareus (Lightfoot); corcitr = a purple or red dye (Shaw); Nerw. korke = a corruption of an Arabic word into one more familiar (Prior).]

Bot.: Two lichens: (1) Leconora tartarea (Scotch Highlands), (2) Rocella tinctoria.

cork (3), s. [A corruption of calc.] [CALKIN.] A calkin; a nail, or a number of nails, driven into a horse's shoe to prevent his slipping on frosty ground or ice.

cork (1), v.t. [CORK, s.]

* 1. To make of or fit with cork.

"Croppidatus. Ho that wearst a corked shoe or slipper."—Huloet.

2. To stop bottles, casks, &c., with cork stoppers.

"... a bottle in it well corked, . . ."—Anson: Voy. round the World, bk. II, ch. xiii.

3. To blacken anything with a burnt cork.

cork (2), v.t. [CORK (3), s.] To shoe a horse with sharp points. (Nuttall.)

corked, pa. par. or a. [CORK, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

1. Made of or fitted with cork.

2. Stopped with a cork stopper.

3. Blackened with a burnt cork.

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II.

2. Fig.: A glutton.

II. Ornith.: The name of the sea-bird called Phalacrocorax Carbo and other species of the same genus. The genus Phalacrocorax belongs to the family Pelecanidae. The Common Cormorant has the top of the head, the neck, breast, lower parts, and rump lustrous greenish-black, a whitish collar under the throat, the feathers of the upper part of the back and wings ashy brown, bordered by a large band of glossy greenish-black; the iris is green, the feet black. Length 27—29 in. The cormorant is the κόραξ (korax) of Aristotle. It is found in both hemispheres. In Europe it is more frequent in the north than elsewhere. It occurs in Britain. It feeds on fishes, and with voracious appetite. It builds generally on rocky shores and islands, or more rarely on trees. Four other species of the genus are found in Europe. An Asiatic one, the Fishing Cormorant, Phalacrocorax sinensis, is domesticated in China, where it is used for catching fish. According to Mr. Fortone, a string is tied round its neck to prevent it swallowing the fishes which it catches. Not able to make away with them for its own sustenance, it with much docility brings them on board a boat to its master. [PHALACROCORAX.] corn-laws, s. pl.

Law, Polit. Econ., & Hist.: Laws designed to regulate the price of corn. Three distinct phases of opinion on the subject, each carried out by legislation, have occurred in the history of the Corn Laws:—

(2) Period II.: During this period the legislature did its best, in the interest of the landowning class, to prevent the free importation of foreign grain. The first restrictive Act was in 1463 [PERIOD I.] and existed at the same time as other Acts interfering with the export of grain. By 13 Geo. III., c. 43, passed in 1773, importation might take place upon payment of 6d. per quarter when the price of wheat rose above 48s., and the exportation when it fell to 44s. In 1791 the 48s. was raised to 54s.; the duty when wheat was between 50s. and 54s. was 2s. 6d.; and when below 50s., 2s. 8d. Other Acts followed in 1801, 1804, and 1816, till at length a sliding scale was introduced in 1828, by 9 Geo. IV., c. 38. By this enactment grain could at any time be imported on payment of a duty, diminishing as the home price of grain increased.

(3) Period III.: On March 15, 1838, Mr. Villiers, seconded by Mr. William Molesworth, attacked the Corn Laws in the House of Commons, but was defeated by an overwhelming majority. The same year Mr. Cobden urged the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to petition Parliament against the Corn Laws, and the Anti Corn-Law League was brought into existence, Messrs. Cobden and Bright being very prominent members. On March 12, 1839, Mr. Villiers again brought the subject before the House of Commons, losing the vote this time only by 295 to 342. A similar motion in the House of Lords failed by 24 to 224. Just before the fall of the Whig Ministry in 1841, Lord John Russell was in favour of a small fixed duty on the importation of corn, while Sir Robert Peel retained attachment to the sliding scale. A large majority (360 to 269) of the House of Commons sided with Peel, August 27, 1841, in the decisive vote which overthrew the Whig government, and on Feb. 9, 1842, he proposed a new sliding scale, which ultimately became law. [SLIDING SCALE.] In the recess between the Parliamentary sessions of 1843 and 1846, the failure of the potato crop, and the consequent famine in Ireland, brought the subject of the Corn Laws again to the foreground. Sir Robert Peel saw that they could not longer be maintained. Men were dying of hunger, and the Corn Laws made bread artificially dear. Lord Stanley (afterwards the premier, Lord Derby) and other Conservatives could not be brought to concur with Sir Robert Peel in undertaking the necessary change. The Queen was therefore advised to send for Lord John Russell, and did so, but he failed to form a Cabinet. Sir Robert Peel therefore returned to office, and on Jan. 27, 1846, proposed a Bill abolishing the Corn Laws, which received the Royal assent on June 26, 1846. It is the Act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 46. A small remnant of duty, 1s. per quarter, left by Peel, was swept away on June 24, 1869. The working-classes of the towns may be trusted to prevent any revival of laws the effect of which would be to make their bread dearer, for the benefit of one or two classes in the community wealthier than themselves.

† corn-clād, a. [Eng. corn, and clad.] Clad or covered with corn; bearing corn.

corn-crāke, s. [Eng. corn, and crake (q.v.), from the cry of the bird.]

1. Ornith.: A bird, Crex pratensis, perpetually heard in the proper season in cornfields uttering the cry "Crek, creak," from which it derives its name, but so skilful in hiding itself from prying spectators that it is rarely that the actual bird itself is seen. It is a wader of the family Rallidae, and the sub-family Rallinae. The feathers of the upper parts are blackish-brown, ash-coloured on the sides, and reddish at the tip; the wing coverts rusty-red; the throat and belly white; the breast olive-ash; the sides reddish, striped with white. It is migratory, coming to us about the beginning of May, and making a nest of slender flags or grasses on the ground or on small hillocks. It leaves for the continent in October. It feeds on grasshoppers, worms, snails, insects, grain, &c.

2. Farming: A hand-rattle, used to frighten birds from sown seed or growing corn; denominated, it is supposed, from its harsh sound as resembling the cry of the rail. (Jamieson.)

corne, s. [From Lat. cornus (q.v).]

corne-tree, s. Cornus sanguinea. [CORNEL, CORNUS.]

cor-nē-a, s. [Lat. fem. sing. of cornuus = horny, from cornu = a horn.]

Anat.: The transparent forepart of the external coat of the eye, called cornea from its horny structure. Its fuller name is Cornea pellucida, the term pellucida referring to its transparency. This distinguishes it from the Cornea opaca or sclerotic coat. It lets light into the interior of the eyeball. Its forepart is circular or nearly so, the arc being about one-sixth of the circumference of the sphere to which it belongs. Its curvature having a smaller radius than the sclerotic, it projects beyond that membrane, and is more convex in youth than in advanced age. (Quain.) [LONG-SIGHTEDNESS, NEAR-SIGHTEDNESS.]

¶ (1) Cornea opaca: [Lat., lit. = the opaque horny body.]

Anat.: The same as the SCLEROTIC COAT (q.v.).

corne-mūse, s. [Fr., from corne = a horn; O. Fr. musé = a pipe; Ital., Sp., & Port. cornusaca.]

* 1. A pipe or fute.

"With cornemuse and shalmie."
Cooper, III, 282.

2. The French and Italian name for the bagpipe. (Grove.)

* cor-nē-ōūs, a. [Lat. cornuus, from cornu = a horn.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Horny; of a substance resembling or having the qualities of horn; hard.

2. Bot., Zool., &c.: Horny, hard, and very close in texture, but capable of being cut without difficulty, the parts cut off being brittle, as the albumen of many plants. (Lindley, &c.)

¶ Cornuus lead:

Min.: The same as PHOSGENITE (q.v.).

cor-nēr, * cor-nyer, s. & a. [Fr. cornière, from Low Lat. corneria = an angle, a corner, from Low Lat. cornu = a corner, closely connected with Lat. cornu = a horn; Wel. cornel; Irish cearn = a corn.] [HORN.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) An angle; the point where two converging lines or surfaces meet.

"Three aspens at three corners of a square."
Woruesworth: Hart Leap Well, II.

(2) The space included between any two converging lines.

(3) The edge or extremity, even though not angular.

" . . . neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard."—Lev. xix. 27.

"Hengeston Hill. . . produces a great plenty of Cornish-diamonds."—Dafoe: Tour through Great Britain, II. 5.

Cornish-engine, s. A form of single-acting condensing steam-engine used especially in the copper and tin mines of Cornwall, but also used as a pumping-engine for water-supply in very many places. Steam, being admitted above the piston at the commencement of the stroke, follows the piston to the point of cut-off; the remainder of the stroke is completed by the combined aid of expansion and the momentum acquired by the mass of material set in motion by the first impulse of the steam. On the completion of the stroke, the steam is allowed to pass freely from one side of the piston to the other, producing an equilibrium of effect during the out-stroke.

Before the piston arrives at the point of commencement again, the equilibrium-valve is closed, shutting in a quantity of steam before it. By means of this cushioning, which is subject to the nicest adjustment, the loss from clearance and steam-ports is rendered practically nothing, if the steam so compressed be equal to the initial pressure. (Knights.)

Cornish heath, s. [So named from its abundance in Cornwall.] A heath, Erica vagans.

Cornish-hug, s.

1. Lit.: (See extract).

"A Cornish hug is a term used in wrestling, when one has an adversary on his breast, and holds him there."—Chambers.

* 2. Fig.: A treacherous throw or injury done by a pretended friend. (Fuller.)

Cornish moneywort, s. Sibthorpia europæa.

* cor-nish, s. [CORNICE.] A cornice.

"Ten small pillars . . . sustaining the cornish."—Sandys: Travels, p. 164.

corn'-ish, a. [Eng. cornish; -ed.]

Her.: Adorned with a cornice or moulding.

* corn'-ist, s. [Eng. corn(ist); -ist.] A performer on the cornet or horn.

corn'-less, a. [Eng. corn; -less.] Destitute of or unprovided with corn.

"... the cornless state of the parson's stable."—Lytton: Pelham, ch. lxiv. (Davies.)

corn'-mûge, s. [CORNEMUSE.]

cor-nô'-pé-an, s. [Lat. cornu = a horn; Gr. παίαν (paian) = a hymn, a war-song.]

Music: [CORNET-À-PISTON].

cor-nô'-vin, s. [Mod. Lat. cornov(a), and Eng. suff. -in.]

Chem.: A resin soluble in alcohol and ether, obtained from the bark of Cornu Cornova, a tree growing in the East Indies.

corn-stone, s. [Eng. corn, and stone.]

Geology:

1. An earthy limestone of Devonian age, often mottled red and green, existing in Hereford, Salop, and the South of Wales. In places it exists only in small concretionary lumps, but at others it expands into large sub-crystalline masses. Fish remains are found in it in Herefordshire, Brecknockshire, and Shropshire, and on the Moray Frith. (Murchison: Siluria.)
2. An earthy concretionary limestone in the Permian rocks, undistinguishable externally from No. 1, but quite different in age, being much more recent.

cor-nû, s. [Lat. = a horn.]

Science, &c.: A horn, or anything more or less horn-shaped.

cornu-ammonis, s. [The horn of Ammon, i.e., of Jupiter Ammon, the horns on whose head the fossil cephalopod so-called was supposed to resemble.]

1. Geol.: An old name for the fossil shells belonging to the genus Ammonites or the family Ammonitidæ (q.v.).

2. Anat.: A name for the hippocampus major or pes hippocampi of the brain. [CORNU.]

cor-nû-a, s. pl. [Lat., pl. of cornu = a horn.]

1. Anat. & Zool.: Horns, or horn-like processes on any part of the body or the framework more or less comparable to horns. They are larger than cornicula (q.v.). There are cornua of the coccyx, of the hyoid bone, of the fascia lata, &c. (Quain.)

2. Bot.: Horn-like processes in the corona of certain plants. [CORNU.]

* cor-nû-bi-an-ite, s. [Lat. Cornubia = Cornwall, and suff. -ite (Mtn.) (q.v.).]

Geol.: A hard and laminated purple or dark blue rock found in the west of Cornwall. Dana considers it identical with Felsite (q.v.).

cor-nû-cô'-pí-a, cor-nû-cô'-pí-æ, s. [Lat. = the horn of plenty; cornu = a horn; copia = plenty.]

1. Antiq. (Of the two forms): The horn of plenty; a horn wreathed and filled to overflowing with flowers, fruit, corn, &c. It was late, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hère, campl, hêr, thêre; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gô, pôtt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, râle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ê. ey = â. qu = kw.

the symbol of plenty, peace, and concord. It was fabled to have been a gift from Jupiter to his nurse, the goat Amalthea. It was a frequent attribute of Ceres.

"A cornucopia fill'd her weaker hand,
Charg'd with the various offspring of the land,
Fruit, flowers, and corn."
Hughes: The Triumph of Peace.

2. Bot. (Of the form Cornucopia): A genus of grasses, tribe Phalarææ. Only known species, the Cornucopia cucullata (the Horn of Plenty Grass), often cultivated here in gardens. It is a native of Greece and Asia Minor.

cor-nū-lī-tōs, s. [Lat. cornu = a horn, and Gr. lithos (lithos) = a stone.]

Faunat.: A genus of Silurian Annelids, order Tubicolæ. Cornulites serpyllarius is a cosmopolitan Silurian fossil, ranging from Sweden to North America, and ascending from a low position in the Llandefio formation to the very summit of the Ludlow rocks. Murchison considered it a fossil very distinctive of the Silurian formation. (Murchison: Siluria.)

cor-nūs, a. [Lat. cornus, cornum = (1) a cornel-cherry, a dogwood tree, (2) a javelin made of cornel-wood; from cornu = a horn, the name being given on account of the hardness of the wood.]

1. Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Cornacæ (q.v.). Calyx, four-toothed; petals, four superior; stamens, four. Fruit, drupaceous, two-celled, two-seeded. The Dogwood of the United States (cornus florida, C. sericea, and C. circinata) are used in the United States as substitutes for Peruvian bark in intermittent fevers; the young branches of the first-named plant stripped of their bark and rubbed with their ends against the teeth make them very white, while the Indians extract a scarlet colour from the bark of the fibrous roots. C. officinalis is cultivated in Japan, where its fruits are an ingredient in the fever drinks of the country. (For the CORNELL and the CORNELIAN CHERRY, see these words.)

The Common Dogwood of Europe (C. sanguinea) is beautiful in autumn from the redness of its foliage. The wood makes the best charcoal for gunpowder, and is very hard, being made into skewers, cogs for wheels, &c. In past times it was used for making arrows. It is about five or six feet high, with straight branches. The Dwarf Cornel (C. suecica) is a herbaceous plant about six inches high, whose berries are said to be tonic, and to have the power of increasing the appetite. It is a creeping plant, growing in alpine pastures in Scotland and Northernland.

2. Palæo-botany: It is believed that the genus Cornus has been found in the Cretaceous rocks of the United States.

cor-nū-spīr'-s, s. [Lat. cornu = a horn, and spira = a coil, twist, or spire.]

Zool. & Palæont.: A foraminifer with an unchanging spiral, suggestive of the form of the Gasteropodous genus Planorbis. It came into existence only in the Tertiary, and still exists in the North Atlantic about 530 fathoms deep.

*cor-nūte', v.t. [CORNUTE, a.] To bestow horns upon, to make a cuckold of, to cuckold.

"You are most shamefully, most infinitely, most scornfully cornuted."—Ford: Love's Sacrifice, iv. l.

cor-nūte', a. & s. [Lat. cornutus = horned; cornu = a horn.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Bearing horns; horned.

* 2. Fig.: Cuckolded.

II. Bot.: Horn-shaped, horned; terminating in a process like a horn, as the fruit of Trapa bicornis.

* B. As subst.: A cuckold.

*cor-nūt'-ēd, a. [Eng. cornut(e); -ēd.]

1. Lit.: Bearing horns, horned.

2. Fig.: Cuckolded.

"Cornuted aldermen, and hen-peck'd squires."
Somerville: The Boasting-Green.

*cor-nū-tō, s. [Ital., from Lat. cornutus = horned, cornu = a horn.] A cuckold, one who wears the horns.

"... the peaking cornute her husband, . . ."
Shaksp.: Merry Wives, III. 5.

*cor-nū-tōr, s. [Eng. cornut(e); -or.] One who cuckold another; a cuckold-maker.

"Defiles his bed and proves his own cornutor."
Jordan: Poems, bk. II.

cor-nū-wāin, s. [Eng. corn, and wain.] A corn-wagon.

"... a loaded cornwain preseth its sheaves."
Bp. Horley: Biblical Criticism, vol. I, p. 230.

Corn'-wall (1), s. [From Cornubia, the old Latin name of the county; Wel. Kernu = Cornwall; Wel. kern, corn = a horn, and A.S. Wealas = the Britons.]

Geog.: A county of England, constituting the south-west extremity of the island. It is from about 70 to 81 miles long by 42 broad.

corn'-wall (2), s. [A corruption of cornel (2), i.e., of cornu.] Cornwall-sallet. [CORNEL-SALLET, CORN-SALLET.]

corn'-wal-lite, s. [Ger. cornwallit, from Eng. Cornwall (q.v.), where it occurs, and Eng. suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A green amorphous mineral, with a hardness of 4.5, and a sp. gr. of 4.16. Compos.: Arsenic acid, 30.22; phosphoric acid, 2.16; oxide of copper, 54.55; and water, 13.02. Found in olivinite in Cornwall. (Dana.)

corn'-weed, s. [Eng. corn, and weed.] Biscn-rula pelecinius. (Treas. of Bot.)

† corn'-y (1), a. [Eng. corn (1), s.; -y.]

I. Literally:

1. Producing corn or grain.

2. Furnished with grains of corn.

"... bringing home the corny ear."
Prior: Solomon; Knowledge.

3. Consisting, or of the nature, of corn.

"The summer's corny crown."
Sir P. Sidney: Pa. Ixix.

4. Made or produced from corn or malt.

"Now I have drunk a draught of corny ale."
Chaucer: The Pardoner's Tale, 12, 200.

II. Fig.: Intoxicated. (Slang.)

* cor-nŷ (2), a. [Eng. corn (2), s.; -y.] Of the nature or appearance of horn; corneous.

cor'-ō-cōre, s. [Malay (?) or some other language from the Eastern Islands.]

Naut.: A type of vessel used in the Eastern Archipelago. It is of various forms. A coroco of the Moluccas is a masted vessel 50–60 ft. long, matted over for about four-fifths of its distance. That in use in Celebes has a raised apparatus projecting beyond the gunwale and the stern to accommodate a number of rowers. The crew sometimes number sixty men, and the vessel is not unfrequently employed for piratical purposes. (Ogilvie.)

* cor'-ō-dŷ, * cor'-rō-dŷ, s. [Low Lat. corrodium, corredium, credidium; Ital. corredo; O. Fr. corroi = furniture, provision. The ultimate source of the word is not clear, but is probably Lat. con = with, together, and rodo = to gnaw, to eat.]

Old Law: A sum of money, or allowance of meat, drink, and clothing, due to the king from an abbey, or other house of religion, whereof he is founder, towards the reasonable sustenance of such a one of his servants, or vadelets, as he thinks good to bestow it on. The difference between a corody and a pension seems to be, that a corody is allowed towards the maintenance of any of the king's servants in an abbey; a pension is given to one of the king's chaplains for his better maintenance, till he may be provided of a benefice. (Blount.)

† cō-rōl', s. [COROLLA.]

Bot.: An anglicised form of Lat. corolla (q.v.).

cō-rōl'-la, s. [Lat. = a little crown, wreath, or garland; dimin. of corona = a crown, a wreath or garland.]

Bot.: The inner whorl of two series of floral envelopes, occurring in the more highly developed plants. It is situated within the outer of these envelopes called the calyx, and exteriorly to the stamens and pistils. In all cases its divisions, which are called petals, alternate with those of the calyx. They are generally coloured—i.e., in botanical language, they are some other colour than green. The corolla is, as a rule, larger than the calyx, but in some plants this is not the case. When the petals of a corolla are all distinct, they are said to be polypetalous, which is the normal type of a corolla. When they cohere continuously by their margins they are generally called monopetalous (one-petalled), which is not a quite accurate term; a better one is gamopetalous, meaning that the petals have in a certain sense contracted what may be poetically called a marriage union. For the several forms of corollæ see MONOPETALOUS, POLYPETALOUS; see also PETAL. The petals of a corolla are really only modifications of leaves. The corolla is not essential to the reproduction of a plant. It shades the productive organs inside it from injury, and, in some cases, by secreting honey attracts bees and other insects to aid in their fertilisation.

COROLLA OF CANTERBURY-BELL.

cōr'-ōl-lā'-cō-ōūs, a. [Lat. corolla, and suff. -aceus.] Pertaining to a corolla.

"... a corollaceous covering."—Lee.

cōr'-ōl-lā-rŷ or cō-rōl'-lā-rŷ, * cō'-rōl-ar-ŷ, * cō'-rōl-ar-ŷ, s. [Fr. corollaire; Ital. corollario; Lat. corollarium = a present of a crown or garland; corolla = a little crown, dimin. of corona = a crown.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

* 1. A present of a crown or a wreath.

"A corollaria or mède of coronæ."
Chaucer: Boethius, p. 94.

2. In the same sense as B. I.

II. Figuratively:

1. An appendix, a supplement.

"A corollary to this preface, in which I have done justice to others."—Dryden: Fables. (Pref.)

2. A consequence, a result.

"It is but a natural corollary that we enforce our vigilance against it."—Government of the Tongue.

* 3. Surplus, excess.

"Now come, my Ariel, bring a corollary, Rather than want a spirit; appear, and partly."
Shaksp.: Tempest, IV. 1.

† 4. Any adjunct.

"What they call liberty and its corollaries."—J. A. Proude, in Daily Telegraph, Feb. 20, 1852.

B. Technically:

1. Math.: An inference, deduction, or consequence which follows from what is directly demonstrated in a proposition.

2. Law: A collateral consequence.

† cōr'-ōl-lāte, cōr'-ōl-lā-tōd, a. [Lat. corolla, and Eng., &c., suff. -ate.]

1. Like a corolla.

2. Having a corolla.

† cōr'-ōl-lēt, s. [A dimin. of Fr. corolle = a corolla.]

Bot.: The corolla of a floret in an aggregated flower.

cō-rōl-lŷ-flōr'-æ, s. pl. [Lat. corolla (q.v.), flōs (genit. flōris) = a flower, and fem. pl. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A division or subdivision of Exogens, in which the petals are united into a hypogynous corolla or not attached to the calyx. It was first introduced by Decandolle in the edition of his "Théorie," published in 1819. He included under it such orders as Sapotaceæ, Ebenacæ, Oleaceæ, Apocynacæ, Gentianacæ, Convolvulacæ, Labiatæ, &c. It may be divided into two series—a Hypogynous one, in which the stamens are free from the corolla, and an Epipetalous one, in which they are inserted upon the corolla.

† cōr-ōl-līnē, a. [Eng. corolla(a); line.]

Bot.: Of or pertaining to a corolla.

"On the parts of the flower coloured hairs occur which have been called corollina."—Balfour: Bot., § 11.

† cōr-rōl-līst, s. [Eng. corolla(a); list.]

Bot.: One who classifies plants according to their corollas.

"The botanical world was divided into factions of corollists and fructuists."—Earle: Eng. Plant Names, p. xxxvii.

cōr-rōl-lūle, cōr-ōl-lū-lā, s. [Dimin. of Lat. corolla (q.v.).]

Botany:

1. Gen.: A small corolla.

2. Spec.: The corolla of a floret in a composite flower.

Cōr-ō-mān-dēl, s. & a. [A corruption of Tamil Telugu, &c. Cholomandala, from Chola, the name of a dynasty of kings, and mandala = region.]

A. As substantive:

Geog.: The territory along the western shore of the Bay of Bengal, from the mouth of the Krishna to Point Calimere.

B. As adj.: Pertaining in any way to the region described under A.

† Coromandel-wood, s. A name sometimes given to any fine wood of the genus Diospyros, brought from the Coromandel coast.

cōr-rō-nā, s. [Lat. = a garland, wreath, or crown.]

1. Roman Archaeol.: A garland or crown given as the reward of bravery. The highest of these honorary decorations was the civic crown (corona civica), given to one who had saved the life of a Roman citizen. To one who first mounted a rampart or entered the enemy's camp the corona vallaris or castrensis was given. On one who first scaled the walls of a city is an assant the corona muralis bestowed; and on one who first boarded a ship belonging to the enemy the corona navalis.

2. Architecture:

(1) A broad projecting face, forming the principal member of a cornice. The soffit is throated, so as to form a drip edge.

(2) A circle or crown suspended from a roof, especially of churches, to hold tapers; called also corona lucis. Sometimes it is constructed with tiers of cirelets rising pyramidically.

3. Bot.: A whorl of leaf-like or filiform organs, often brightly-coloured, intervening between the perianth and the stamens, sometimes attached to the former and sometimes to the latter. In the Narcissus it is coherent and bell-shaped; in the Passion-flower it consists of brightly-coloured hairs; in Lychnis it is a small coronet at the base of the rotund lamina of the corolla; in Laminum it is a circle of leaves; in various Boraginaceae it consists of five scales; while in Parnassia it appears in the form of five leaves, their apex studded with 9–5 glandular bodies. (Thomd.)

4. Anal.: Anything crown-shaped. Thus the collection of radiating fibres in each hemisphere of the brain is called the corona radiata. Mayo termed it the fibrous cone.

5. Astron.: Either of two constellations. [¶] (1), (2).]

6. Optics:

(1) Gen.: An appearance like a halo surrounding the heavenly bodies.

(2) Spec.: A halo surrounding the moon when she is seen projected against the sun's disc in a total eclipse of the latter luminary. It has been supposed to be the atmosphere of the sun, which at other times is invisible.

"The corona depicted on the photographic plate was vastly different from the corona seen by the eye."—The Transit of Venus, in Times, April 20, 1875.

¶] (1) Corona australis (the Southern Crown):

Astron.: A southern constellation near Centaurus. It is an ancient constellation first mentioned by Ptolemy.

(2) Corona borealis (the Northern Crown): Astron.: An ancient northern constellation, situated between Bootes and Hercules.

(3) Corona hirci:

Arch.: The same as CORONA, 2 (2).

cōr-ō-nāch, cōr-ā-nīch (ch guttural), s. [Gael. corrach.] A dirge, a funeral lamentation.

"... and next morning, their wives and daughters came, clapping their hands, and crying the corrach, and shrieking, and carried away the dead bodies."—Scott: Waverley, ch. xv.

cōr-ō-nāl or cōr-ō-nal, a. & s. [Fr. coronal; Lat. coronalis, from corona = a crown.]

A. As adjective: (Of both forms).

1. Of or pertaining to a corona, in any of the senses of the word.

"... we should have obtained a detailed spectrum of the coronal atmosphere and chromosphere."—The Transit of Venus, in Times, April 20, 1875.

2. Of or pertaining to the crown of the head.

"... a round tubercle between the sagittal and coronal sutures."—Wiseman.

3. Pertaining to the crown or to a coronation.

"The law and his coronal oath require his undeviating assent."—Milton: Eikonoklastes, ch. vi.

B. As substantive: (cōr-ō-nāl).

1. Ord. Lang.: A wreath, a crown.

"Those boys with their green coronal."—Wordsworth: Idle Shepherd-boys.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: The first suture of the skull.

2. Tournaments: A tilting spear. [CORONEL (1), s.]

¶] Coronal suture:

Anat.: A suture connecting the frontal and the two parietal bones. It is called also the fronto-parietal suture.

cōr-ō-nāl-īy, adv. [Eng. coronal; -ly.] In a coronal manner; in a circle.

"The oil was poured coronally or circularly upon the head of kings."—Brown: Garden of Cyrus, ch. 1.

cōr-ō-nā-men, s. [Lat. = a garland or wreath.]

Zool.: The superior margin of a hoof; the coronet.

cōr-ō-nār-ī-æ, s. pl. [Fem. pl. of coronarius = pertaining to a wreath or garland, from corona (q.v.).]

Bot.: An order in Linnæus's Natural System. He included under it Ornithogalum, Scilla, &c.

cōr-ō-nār-ī-æ, s. pl. [CORONABLE.]

Bot.: The name given by Mr. Bentham to one of the four great series into which he divides the Endogens, the others being Epigynæ, Nudifloræ, and Glumales. The Coronariæ, ranked second in the series, have flowers with a double, usually petaloid, perianth; and a superior ovary almost always syncarpous.

cōr-ō-nā-rīy, a. & s. [Fr. coronaire; Lat. coronarius, from corona = a crown, a wreath.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to or situated on the head as a crown; resembling or representing a crown.

"The coronary thorns did pierce his tender and sacred temples."—Bp. Pearson: On the Creed.

2. Anat.: Resembling a crown or cirelet; an epithet applied to certain arteries, ligaments, veins, &c.

B. As substantive:

Veter.: A small bone in the foot of a horse.

coronary arteries, s. pl.

Anat.: Two arteries springing from the aorta before it leaves the pericardium, whose function is to supply the substance of the heart with blood.

"The substance of the heart itself is most certainly made and nourished by the blood, which is conveyed to it by the coronary arteries."—Bentley: Sermons.

coronary ligament, s.

Anat.: For def. see extract.

"... the round ligament called the coronary ligament of the radius."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. vi, p. 137.

coronary vein, s.

Anat.: A vein running in a groove of considerable depth in a transverse direction, and separating the auricles from the ventricles of the heart. It ends in the right auricle. (Todd & Bowman.)

coronary vessels, s. pl. Certain vessels which furnish the substance of the heart with blood.

cōr-ō-nāte, a. [Lat. coronatus, from corona = a crown.]

* I. Ord. Lang.: Having or wearing a crown; crowned.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Furnished with a coronet. A terra sometimes used of the papus of some composite plants, as, for instance, the Tanay, Tanacetum vulgare.

2. Zool. (Of spiral shells): Having the whorls surrounded by a row of spines or tubercles, as in some species of Voluta, Conus, Mitra, &c. In this sense it is more frequently written Coronated.

cōr-ōn-ā-tēd, a. [Esg. coronate(e); -ed.] The same as CORONATE (q.v.).

cōr-ōn-ā-tion (1), cōr-ōn-ā-oy-on, s. & a. [Low Lat. coronatio, from corona = a crown; Ital. coronazione; Sp. coronacion. Corona in Latin does not mean the royal crown, but, like the Gr. στέφανος (stephanos), is only such a "crown" or garland as the victors at the Olympic games and other men subjects gained and were allowed to wear. (Trench: Synonyms of the New Testament, p. 86.)] [CROWN.]

A. As substantive:

1. The act or ceremony of solemnly crowning a king, at which he is invested with the insignia of royalty.

"Coronaynge or coronaycon. Coronacio."—Prompt. Parv.

"... the most splendid coronation that had ever been known."—Maccuslay: Hist. Eng., ch. 11.

* 2. The pomp or assembly attending at the ceremony of crowning a king.

"In penive thought reared the fancied scene, See coronations rise on every green."—Keats: Epipsy, v. 84.

¶] The ceremony was in use among the Jews (2 Kings xi, 12), and from them probably the Christian nations borrowed it at first. It is frequently mentioned in the Saxon Chronicle. English sovereigns are still crowned. For the oath they have first to swear see CORONATION OATH.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or connected with the ceremony of coronation.

"... a coach, air, which I caught with ringing in the king's affairs upon his coronation-day, air."—Shakespeare: Henry IV., iii. 2.

coronation oath, s. The oath taken by a king at his coronation.

¶] For the words of the oath taken by English rulers, which remains as they were in Blackstone's time, see the extract:—

"The coronation oath is conceived in the following terms:—

The Archbishop or Bishop shall say, Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this Kingdom of England and the dominions thereto belonging according to the estates in parliament assembled and the laws and customs of the same? The King or Queen shall say, I solemnly promise so to do.

Archbishop or Bishop. Will you to your power cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments?

King or Queen. I will. Archbishop or Bishop. Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God, the true possession of the gospel and the protestant reformed religion established by the law? And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain unto them, or any of them?

King or Queen. All this I promise to do. After this the King or Queen, laying his or her hand upon the holy gospel, shall say, The things which I have here promised I will perform and keep, so help me God; and then shall kiss the book."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. 1, ch. vi.

¶] By the Act of Union, 5 Anne, c. 8, the sovereign ascribes an oath also to preserve the Protestant and Presbyterian Church Government in Scotland before ruling over that land.

coronation stone, s.

Archæol. & Hist.: A stone on which the sovereign is crowned. It is fixed under the seat of the oaken coronation chair. It is a historic fact that, prior to A.D. 1296, it lay in the abbey of Scone in Perthshire, and that the Scotch had for a long period been accustomed to crown their kings upon it. In 1296, however, it was taken by Edward I., and an engagement made in 1328, in the treaty of Northampton, to give it back was not kept. It seems historic too that it had been first placed in the abbey of Scone in A.D. 805, the Scotch having brought it originally from Ireland. But when an effort is made to identify it with the stone which the patriarch Jacob rolled for a pillow at Luz or Bethel (Gen.

cor-ón-á-tion (2), s. [A corruption of coronation (q.v.).] Dianthus Caryophyllus.

*co-ró-ne, v.t. [CROWN.] To crown. "Salomon was coron'd Kyng."—Legend of Holy Boob, p. 78.

cor-ró-nē (1), s. (Gr. κορώνη (korōnē) = (1) a crown, (2) anything bent or curved like a crow's bill.)

Anat.: The acute process of the lower jawbone, so named for a fancied resemblance to a crow's bill.

*co-ró-ne (2), *co-rowne, s. [CROWN.] "Than lieth the mede in the corone." Chaucer: Boethius, p. 119.

cor-ón-el (1), *cor-mall, s. [A dimin. from Lat. corona.]

1. The iron head of a tilting-spear, constructed so as to be sufficient to unhorse without wounding a knight. Though properly of iron, it was occasionally, when intended for practice or pleasure only, made of wood. It terminated in three points, thus remotely resembling a crown, whence it received its name.

"Cornall, and amplets and grapers."—Pastorals.

2. A tilting-spear.

"With coronalls stee and stelde."—Lybans Discours, 919.

*coronel (2), s. [COLONEL.]

cor-ó-nēl-la, s. [Mod. Lat. dimin. from Class. Lat. corona = a crown.]

Zool.: A genus of Ophidiids, the typical one of the family Coronellidae (q.v.). Coronella austriaca is common on the continent.

cor-ó-nēl-lí-dē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coronella, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idē.]

Zool.: A family of Ophidiids, sub-order Coubrina. They are broad snakes, flat beneath, with the shields of the head regular. [CORONELLA.]

*co-ron-e-ment, *co-ron-ment, s. [Mid. Eng. corone = crown; and suff. -ment.] A coronation or crowning.

"When the folk had hien at the coronement." Robert de Brunne, p. 71.

cor-ó-nēr, s. [Low Lat. coronator, from corona.]

Law: A functionary whose name coroner—anciently coronator, from Lat. corona = a crown—implies that he has principally to do with pleas of the crown or in which at least the crown is concerned. His office is very ancient, mention being made of it in A.D. 925. His court is a court of record in which, after sight of the body of one who has died in prison, or so suddenly that suspicions of violence may be excited, a jury summoned for the purpose pronounces a decision as to the cause of death. "Accidental death" is a frequent verdict, but there are cases in which it is "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown," or an individual is named. In this the proceedings under the auspices of the coroner prepare the way for a criminal prosecution. He also officiates as a sheriff's substitute when the sheriff himself is interested in a suit, and cannot therefore act in it himself. The office is an elective one in the United States.

coroner's court, s.

Law: A court of record in which a coroner discharges his appropriate functions.

coroner's inquest, s. An investigation into the cause of death, held by a coroner, usually with the aid of a jury.

*cor-ó-nēt (1), s. [CORNET.]

cor-ó-nēt (2), s. [Ital. coronetta, dimin. from Lat. corona = a crown.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A small crown or circle of gold, or of gold and precious stones.

"... 'twas not a crown neither, 'twas one of these coronets..."—Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, 1. 3.

2. Fig.: Nobility, noble birth or high descent.

"Kind hearts are more than coronets." Tennyson: Lady Clara Vere de Vere.

II. Technically:

1. Her.: An inferior kind of crown worn by the nobility. The coronet of the Prince of Wales consists of a circlet of gold, on the edge four crosses patée or between as many fleur-de-lis; and from the centre crosses rises an arch surmounted by an orb and cross. The coronet of a duke is adorned with strawberry leaves; that of a marquis with leaves and pearls interposed; that of an earl has the pearls raised above the leaves; a viscount's coronet is surrounded with pearls only, as is also that of a baron; but in the case of the latter the number is restricted to four.

2. Archæol.: An ornamental head-dress.

3. Tournament: A coronel or head of a tilting-spear. [CORONEL (1), s.]

4. Veterinary: The lower part of the pastern of a horse that runs round the coffin, and is distinguished by the hair that joins and covers the upper part of the hoof.

5. Bot.: Hair arranged in a form like that of a coronet. Ex., those at the apex of a ripe seed of Euphonium. (Thom.)

*cor-ó-nēt, v.t. [CORONER, s.] To adorn or deck, as with a coronet.

"The simple lily brad That coronets her temples." Scott: Bride of Triermain, III. 8.

cor-ó-nēt-ēd, a. [Eng. coronet; -ēd.] Wearing or entitled to wear a coronet; of noble birth.

cor-rón-í-form, a. [Lat. corona = a crown, and forma = form, appearance.] Having the form or appearance of a crown.

cor-ó-níl-la, s. [Mod. Lat. dimin. of Class. Lat. corona = a crown.]

Bot.: A genus of Leguminosæ, the type of the sub-tribe Coronilloe (q.v.). It has unequally pinnated leaves and long tapering legumes, separating at last into one-seeded joints. Coronilla Emerici is called Scorpion Senecio. It is a small bush with bright yellow flowers, growing in many parts of Europe. Its leaves are cathartic, like those of the true senna, but less powerful in their action. Other cathartic species are C. varia, from Southern Europe, C. globosa, and C. Iberica; but the juice of C. varia is poisonous. Various others are cultivated as ornamental plants.

cor-ó-níl-lē-sē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coronilla(s), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -sē.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of leguminous plants, tribe Heydsaræ.

cor-ón-ōld, a. [From Gr. κορώνη (korōnē) = a crown... anything hooked or curved... the apophysis of a bone, and ελκος (elkos) = form.]

Anat.: Hooked or curved at the tip, as various portions of the skeleton are. Thus there is a coronoid fossa of the humerus, a coronoid process of the lower jaw, and another of the ulna.

"The clecranon and coronoid fossæ are confluent." Trans. Amer. Philol. Soc. (1873), vol. XIII, p. 293.

cor-ón-ūle, s. [A dimin. from Lat. corona = a crown, a garland.]

Botany:

1. Gen.: The little crown or coronet of downy tuft on a seed.

2. Spec.: A small body resembling a calyx, crowning the nucule in the genus Chara.

*coroune, *corowne, *corunc, s. & v. [CROWN.]

cor-ró-zō, s. & a. [Native name of the palm.] For definition see etymology.

corozo-nut, s.

Bot.: The seed of a palm, Phytelephas macrocarpa, a native of tropical America, the hardened albumen of which is used by turners under the name of vegetable ivory. Called also Ivory-nut.

cor-pór-a, s. pl. [Lat., pl. of corpus (genit. corporis) = a body.]

Anat.: Bodies. Thus there are Corpora albicantia, corpora Arantii, corpora cavernosa, corpora geniculata, corpora mammillaria, corpora quadrigenina, and corpora striata. [CORPUS.]

Corpora of moveables:

Scots Law: Moveables which may be seen and felt, as furniture, corn, &c., in contradistinction to a debt or anything similar.

cor-pór-al (1), s. [Corrupted from Fr. corporal; Ital. caporale, from Ital. capo = head, chief, from Lat. caput = head.]

Military:

*1. Formerly: A kind of brigade-major, who commanded skirmishing parties detached from the other forces. This was the meaning of the word in the reigns of Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth.

2. Now: A petty non-commissioned officer ranking immediately under a sergeant, and just above the ordinary rank and file. He has charge of one of the squads of the company, places and relieves sentinels, and keeps good order in the guard. He receives the word of the inferior rounds that pass by his guard. There are generally three or four corporals in each company.

"The cruel corporal whipp'd in my ear. Five pounds, if rightly tipp'd, would set me clear." Gay.

¶ (1) Corporal of a ship: An officer that hath the charge of setting the watches and entries, and relieving them; who sees that all the soldiers and sailors keep their arms neat and clean, and teaches them how to use them. He has a mate under him. (Harris.)

(2) Lance corporal:

Milit.: One who acts as corporal previously to his obtaining the full appointment to that grade. Meanwhile his pay is only that of a private.

cor-pór-al, *cor-pó-rall, a. [O. Fr. corporal; Fr. corporal; Lat. corporalis = pertaining to a body, from corpus (genit. corporis) = a body.]

1. Bodily; pertaining to or connected with the body.

"... the creditor had over him all the rights of a slave-master with respect to corporal correction and punishment."—Lewis: Cræd. Early Roman Hist. (1855), ch. XIII, pt. II, § 38, vol. II, p. 479.

2. Material, corporeal; not spiritual; having a body or substance.

"... what seem'd corporal melted, As breath, into the wind." Shakespeare: Macbeth, 1. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between corporeal, corporal, and bodily:—"Corporal, corporal, and bodily, as their origin bespeaks, have all relation to the same object, the body; but the two former are employed to signify relating or appertaining to the body; the latter to denote containing or forming part of the body. Hence we say corporal punishment, bodily vigour or strength, corporal substances: the Godhead bodily, the corporal frame, bodily exertion... corporal is distinguished from spiritual, bodily from mental." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) cor-pór-al (2), *corporalle, *corporas (Eng.), cor-pó-ra-lé (Lat.), s. [O. Fr. corporal; Ital. corporeale; Low Lat. corporeale, from Lat. corporeale (pallium) = a cloak or coverlet for the body.] [CORPORAL, a.]

Eccles.: The fine linen cloth on which the elements of the Eucharist are placed during consecration. [CORPORAS.]

"... this squier had with hym the patent and corporal."—Berners: Froissart's Cronycle, vol. 1, -eb, cc.

¶ A corporal oath: An oath taken by any person with his hand on the corporal or corporas.

cor-pór-a-lé, s. [CORPORAL (2), s.]

*cor-pó-rál-í-tý, *cor-po-ral-ty, s. [Eng. corporal; -ity.]

1. The quality or state of being embodied or of possessing a body; material or corporal existence, as opposed to spirituality.

"While she so many strokes heaps in excess, That fond prose phanatic quite for to suppress Of the soul corporally." More: On the Soul, pt. II, bk. II, ch. III, § 28.

2. A corporation, guild, or confraternity.

"... a corporality of griff-like promoters and apprentices."—Milton: Of Reformation.

 And of there all one corporation make."
Danies: Immortality of the Soul, II. 2
 2. The stomach of a man. (Colloquial.)

II. Law: A corporate body legally empowered to act as a single individual, and having a common seal. A corporation may be either aggregate or sole. Corporations aggregate consist of two or more persons legally incorporated in a society, which is kept up by a succession of members, either in perpetuity or until the corporation is dissolved by Act of Legislature, by the death of all the members, or by the surrender of the charters, franchises, &c. Of this class are the corporations of boroughs, consisting of a mayor, aldermen, and burgesses; the corporation of a cathedral, consisting of the dean and chapter; the shareholders of a bank or insurance company, &c. A corporation sole consists of a single individual and his successors, and is thus perpetuated. Corporations are also divided into lay and spiritual. Lay corporations include those of boroughs, public companies, &c. (known as civil corporations), and those of universities, colleges, hospitals, &c. (known as ecclesiastical corporations). Spiritual corporations include bishops, cathedral chapters, &c. Corporations were originally, and to some extent still are, established by prescription, as bishops, chapters, &c., by letters patent or charters of incorporation from the sovereign, or by Act of Legislature; but any body of persons trading in company can now, under certain regulations and restrictions, acquire for themselves the character of a corporation, enabling them to sue and be sued, and to do all legal acts as one individual.

 "... the efforts of an insignificant corporation..."

Law: The Act 13 Chas. II, § 2, c. 1, passed in 1661, under which no person was allowed to hold any office in any city or corporation in England unless he had within the twelve months preceding received the Sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England. It is generally coupled with the Test Act, passed on March 29, 1673, under the name of the Test and Corporation Acts. Both were repealed on May 9, 1828, public opinion having for some time previously been so much against them that their operation was annually suspended by a Bill of Indemnity.

"... leave was given to bring in a bill repealing the Corporation Act, which had been passed by the Cavalier Parliament soon after the Restoration, and which contained a clause requiring all municipal magistrates to receive the sacrament according to the forms of the Church of England."—Maccaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

 "The corporeals sole and unshapliche."—Railty. Antiqua, l. 129.

¶ (1) Corporeal hereditaments: A legal title for land in its widest acceptance.

(2) Corporeal rights: Such rights as are appreciable by the senses of seeing and handling, as opposed to incorporeal rights, such as obligations of all kinds.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between corporeal and material:—"Corporeal is properly a species of material: whatever is corporeal is material, but not vice versa. Corporeal respects animate bodies; material is used for every thing which can act on the senses, animate or inanimate. The world contains corporeal beings, and consists of material substances."
 (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between corporeal and corporal, see CORPORAL.

—Scott: Glenfinlas.

corpse-sheet, s. A shroud or winding-sheet.

" . . . she wears her corpse-sheet drawn weel up . . ."
—Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian.

corps-let, s. [CORPSET.] A coralet.

"Makes thereof a coralet or a jacke."—Hudson: Judith, l. 309.

cor-pu-lence, cor-pu-len-çy, s. [Fr. corpulence; Lat. corpulentia, from corpus = a body.]

* 1. Corporeality; the quality of having a body and substantial form.

" . . . men phrase God μεθ' ὑλης with matter and corpulency . . ."—Hammond: Works, vol. iv., serm. 7.

2. Excessive fatness or bulkiness of body; fleshiness, obesity.

"Her age and corpulency rendered all attempts of that sort impossible."—Melmoth: Pliny to Tacitus, bk. vi., lett. xx.

* 3. Thickness, grossness, density, or opaqueness.

" . . . the heaviness and corpulency of the water, . . ."
—Ray: On the Creation, p. 1.

* 1. One of the most notable cases known of corpulence was that of Daniel Lambert, who being weighed a few days before his death, in 1809, was found to be 739 lbs., or 52 st. 11 lbs. Corpulence is often constitutional, and not simply dependent on the quantity or character of the food consumed. The latter, however, have a powerful influence. In 1863 Mr. Banting published a pamphlet recommending to the over stout abstinence from sugar and substances containing much starch, a regimen which he considered had enabled him to diminish his own inordinate stoutness.

cor-pu-lent, a. [Fr. corpulent; Sp., Ital., & Port. corpulento; Lat. corpulentus, from corpus = a body.]

I. Literally:

* 1. Corporeal; possessing a body and material form.

* 2. Pertaining to the body; carnal.

" . . . to elevate our faculties, to make it possible to think any thing pleasure, which is not corpulent and carnal."—Hammond: Works, vol. iv., serm. vii.

3. Excessively fat, fleshy, bulky, obese.

" . . . I was very corpulent and heavy . . ."—Hack-lust: Youages, vol. i., p. 112.

* 4. Solid, dense, thick, opaque.

"The overmuch perspicuity of the atoms may seem more corpulent."—Bolton.

* II. Fig.: Dense, obscure, wanting in clearness.

"We say it is a fleshy stile, when there is much periphrasis, and circuit of words; and when, with more than enough, it grows fat and corpulent."—Ben Jonson: Discoveries.

* 1. Crabb thus distinguishes between corpulent, stout, and lusty: "Corpulent respects the fleshy state of the body; stout respects also the state of the muscles and bones; corpulence is therefore an incidental property; stoutness is a natural property; corpulence may come upon us according to circumstances; stoutness is the natural make of the body which is born with us. Corpulence and lustiness are both occasioned by the state of the health; but the former may arise from disease; the latter is always the consequence of good health; corpulence consists of an undue proportion of fat; lustiness consists of a due and full proportion of all the solids in the body." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cor-pu-lent-ly, adv. [Eng. corpulent; -ly.] In a corpulent manner.

cor-pūs, s. [Lat., pl. corpōra.]

* I. Ord. Long.: A body.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: The mass of anything. Thus corpus ligneum, or corpus lignosum, is the mass of the woody tissue in a plant. (Treas. of Bot.)

2. Anat.: In the same sense as I. Various parts of the mechanism of the bodily frame are so called. Thus there are, Corpus callosum, corpus ciliare, corpus dentatum, corpus fimbriatum, corpus Highmoreanum, corpus luteum, and corpus spongiosum urethrae, &c.

corpus callosum, s. [Lat. = the firm body.]

Anat.: The great transverse commissure of the cerebral hemispheres in man and the mammalia.

Corpus Christi, s. [Lat. = the body of Christ.] For def. see etym.

* 1. There is a Corpus Christi College at Cambridge which was founded about A.D. 1351, and another at Oxford founded in A.D. 1546.

* 2. (1) Corpus Christi Day:

Ecclesiol.: The day on which the festival of Corpus Christi is kept.

(2) Festival of Corpus Christi:

Ecclesiol.: A festival in the Church of Rome in honour of the body of Christ, alleged, after transubstantiation has been effected, to be corporally present in the Eucharist. It was first celebrated at Liège, in A.D. 1241, by the Canons of St. Martin. It was recommended in a bull issued by Pope Urban IV. between 1262 and 1264, and confirmed and enjoined by the Council of Vienne in 1311 or 1312. The French call it la Fête-Dieu. It is observed on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday. The rejection of transubstantiation by the English Church at the Reformation naturally carried with it the abolition within its pale of the Corpus Christi festival.

"At plays of Corpus Christi oft was seen."
—Longfellow: The Theologian's Tale; Torquemada.

corpus delicti, s.

Law: The substance of the crime alleged, with the attendant circumstances as specified in the libel.

corpus juris canonici, s.

Law: The body or code of canon law.

corpus juris civilis, s.

Law: The body or code of civil law.

* cor-pu-sançe, s. [CORPOSANT.]

cor-pūs-cle (cle as cel), s. [Lat. corpusculum (pl. corpuscula) = a little body, dimin. of corpus (q.v.).]

I. Ord. Lang.: A little body of anything.

" . . . the little corpuscles that compose and distinguish different bodies!"—Watts: Logic.

II. Technically:

1. Nat. Phil.: In the same sense as [I.]

2. Anatomy:

(1) Human: Minute solid microscopic bodies found in the blood. They are of two kinds, (1) Coloured corpuscles, known also as the red particles or the red globules; and (2) the colourless, known also as the white or pale corpuscles. The former are the more numerous. The coloured corpuscles are not really globular; they are flattened or discoidal, the outline being circular. On the sides constituting the disks there is sometimes a concavity. Their average size is from  $\frac{1}{100}$  to  $\frac{1}{75}$  of an inch in diameter, their breadth  $\frac{1}{2}$  of that amount.

CORPUSCLES OF HUMAN BLOOD.

(2) Compar.: In most mammals the corpuscles are like those of man. In the camel, however, they are elliptical in outline. In birds, reptiles, and most fishes they are oval disks with a central elevation on each side. Those of the invertebrata are, as a rule, not coloured, the annelids alone being an exception. They are, as a rule, disk-shaped, with a circular or an oblong outline. (Quain.)

3. Botany:

Plural:

(1) Certain cells forming within the embryo also in the Coniferae. Each of these corpuscles in its turn produces in its interior a rosette of cells, generally four in number, with which the pollen tube comes in contact. The name corpuscle in this sense was given by the great botanist Robert Brown.

(2) The spore cases of certain fungi.

* 1. Touch corpuscles (Corpusculi tactus):

Anat.: Certain corpuscles found in the skin of the hand and foot, and one or two other parts, designed to make those parts more sensitive in touch. They were discovered by R. Wagner and Meissner. (Quain.)

(2) Vermiform corpuscles:

Bot.: Spiral vessels in a contracted, strangled, or distorted condition. (Treas. of Bot.)

cor-pūs-qu-lar, a. [Fr. corpularaire, from Lat. corpularium.] [CORPUSCLE.] Pertaining to a corpuscle or small body.

"The mechanical or corpular philosophy, though predominant the eldest, as well as the best in the world, had lain dead for many ages in contempt and oblivion."—Bentley.

* 1. Corpularian philosophy: The philosophy which attributes all phenomena to the action of bodies on each other. It is called also the Corpularian philosophy (q.v.).

(2) Corpular theory or hypothesis of light:

Nat. Phil.: The theory or hypothesis which represents light as an imponderable substance consisting of molecules of extreme tenuity, emitted in straight lines with almost infinite velocity from luminous bodies. It is called also the Emission theory. It had the powerful support of Sir Isaac Newton, but the Undulatory theory or hypothesis, the rival of the former one, is that now generally accepted.

cor-pūs-cul-ār-i-an, a. & s. [Lat. corpuscul(a); Eng., &c. suff. -arian.]

A. As adjective:

1. Pertaining or relating to minute bodies or corpuscles, or to the corpuscular philosophy (q.v.).

"As to natural philosophy, I do not expect to see any principles proposed, more comprehensive and intelligible than the corpularian or mechanical."—Boyle.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, Xonophon, exist. pk = ç. -çlan, -çtian = açañ. -çtion, -çtion = shün; -çtion, -çtion = zhün. -çlous, -çtious, -çtious = shüs. -çlie, -çdie, &c. = beç, deç.

2. Supporting the corpuscular philosophy.

"Some corpuscularian philosophers of the last age." —Berkeley: Sirís, § 232.

B. As subst.: An adherent of the corpuscular philosophy.

"He [Newton] seems to have made a greater progress than all the sects of corpuscularians together had done before him." —Sp. Berkeley: Sirís, § 214.

¶ Corpuscularian philosophy: [CORPUSCULAR PHILOSOPHY].

cor-pūs-cū-lār'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. corpuscular; -ity.] The state of being corpuscular.

cor-pūs'-cū-lā-téd, a. [Eng. corpuscul(e), and suff. -ated.] Anat. & Zool.: Containing corpuscles, as the blood, &c.

† cor-pūs-cū-le, s. [CORPUSCLE.]

cor-pūs'-cū-loūs, a. [Lat. corpuscul(um); Eng. suff. -ous.] Corpuscular.

"... the finest cocoon may envelope doomed corpuscularious moths." —Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), xl, 307.

corr, cor-mele, cor-melle, s. [Gael. car-méal = the Hesthpea.] Lathyrus macrorrhizus (Highlands of Scotland, &c.).

* cōr-rā-cle, s. [CORACLE.]

* cōr-rā-de, v.t. [Lat. corrado, from con = cum = with, together, and rado = to rub.]

1. Lit.: To rub or wear into; to wear away by frequent friction.

2. Fig.: To wear out, to consume. "Wealth corroded by corruption." —Dr. R. Clarke, in Optics.

cōr-rād'-éd, pa. par. or a. [CORRADE.]

† cōr-rā-dī-āl, a. [Lat. cor = con = with, together; radius = a ray.] Radiating to or from the same point.

cōr-rā-dī-āte, v.t. [Lat., Eng., &c. corr, the same as con = together, and Eng. radiate.] Optics (Of rays of light): To concentrate in one focus.

cōr-rā-dī-ā-tion, s. [From Eng. corradiate(e); -ion.]

Optics (Of rays of light): The act of concentrating in one focus.

"... a corradiation, and conjunction of beams." —Bacon: Natural History.

cōr-rād'-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [CORRADE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or process of wearing away or consuming by frequent friction, &c.

cōr-rāl, s. [Sp., from corro = a crole; Port. curral = a cattle-pen.]

1. A pen or enclosure for cattle, horses, &c.

2. An enclosed space formed of wagons as a means of defence for emigrants while passing through Indian territory.

3. A pen or enclosure for capturing elephants.

cōr-rāl, v.t. [CORRAL, s.]

1. To shut up into a corral.

2. To form into a corral.

cōr-rē-a, cor-ræ-a, s. [Named after Joseph Correa da Serra, a distinguished Portuguese botanist.]

Bot.: A genus of Rutaceæ, tribe Boreneæ. The leaves are simple, dotted, and downy; the calyx is cup-shaped, nearly entire; the petals four, reddish or greenish; the stamens eight. The leaves of Corræa alba and other species of the same genus are used in their native country, Australia, as a substitute for tea. They are sometimes called Native Fuschias, from a slight resemblance they have to that genus of plants. Some are known in British greenhouses.

* cōr-rec-i-on, * cor-rec-ci-oun, s. [CORRECTION.]

cōr-rēct, a. [Fr. correct; Sp. correcto; Ital. correcto, from Lat. correctus, pa. par. of corripo = to set straight or right; con = cum = with, together, fully, and rego = to rule, to direct.]

1. Set right; free from fault or imperfection, or according to a fixed standard or rule.

2. True, exact; in accordance with facts.

3. According to propriety.

4. Accurate, faultless.

"Always use the most correct editions..." —Fulton.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between correct and accurate: "Correct is equivalent to corrected or set to rights; accurate implies properly done with care, or by the application of care. Correct is negative in its sense; accurate is positive; it is sufficient to be free from fault to be correct; it must contain every minute particular to be accurate. Information is correct which contains nothing but facts; it is accurate when it contains a vast number of details. What is incorrect is allied to falsehood; what is inaccurate is general and indefinite." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōr-rēct, * cor-recte, * cor-ette, v.t. & i. [Fr. corriger; Sp. corregir; Port. corrigir; Ital. correggere.] [CORRECT, a.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To set straight or right what is wrong; to amend. Used—

(1) Of faults of character or conduct:

"Of ilks... I erred man that my default here correct can." —Hampton: Pricks of Conscience, 4562.

(2) Of faults in writing, style, language, &c.:

"He employed himself in correcting the great work on Jurisprudence..." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xlii.

2. To set a person right when he has made a mistake; to point out a mistake or error to.

* 3. To make amends for a fault committed; to accommodate a difference.

* 4. To set right or remedy the effects of anything hurtful.

"It defendeth the humors from putrefaction, and correcteth those that are putred." —Venner: Via Recta, p. 133.

5. To obviate, counteract, or qualify the effects of one ingredient by the mixture or addition of another.

"... its quality of relaxing may be corrected by boiling..." —Arbutnot: On Aliments.

† 6. To counteract the results or effects of any habit, act, or pursuit by occasional interchange with another.

"It was his manner to intermix his literary pursuits in such sort as to make the lighter relieve the more serious; and those again, in their turn, temper and correct the other." —Burd: Life of Warburton.

7. To punish for faults committed; to chastise, to place under discipline.

"For whom the Lord loveth he correcteth..." —Prov. iii, 12.

II. Printing: To revise a proof; to point out by certain marks any words or letters which may require correction; also to alter the type where a wrong letter, &c. has been used.

B. Reflex.: To recall words used in error.

† C. Intransitive:

1. To make corrections or amendments.

"... I corrected, because it was as pleasant to me to correct as to write." —Pope: Homer, Pref.

2. To chastise, to punish.

"... some, like magistrates, correct at home." —Shaksp.: Henry V., l. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between correct, to rectify, and to reform: "Correct respects ourselves or others; rectify has regard to one's self only. Correct is either an act of authority or discretion; rectify is an act of discretion only. What is corrected may vary in its magnitude or importance, and consequently may require more or less trouble; what is rectified is always of a nature to be altered without great injury or effort. Habitual or individual faults are corrected; individual mistakes are rectified. A person corrects himself or another of a bad habit in speaking or pronouncing; he rectifies any error in his accounts. Mistakes in writing must be corrected for the advantage of the scholar; mistakes in pecuniary transactions cannot be too soon rectified for the satisfaction of all parties. Reform like rectify is used only for one's self when it respects personal actions; but reform and correct are likewise employed for matters of general interest. Correct in neither case amounts to the same as reform. A person corrects himself of particular habits; he reforms his whole life: what is corrected undergoes a change, more or less slight; what is reformed assumes a new form and becomes a new thing. Correction is always advisable; it is the removal of an evil: reform is equally so as it respects a man's own conduct; but as it respects public matters, it is altogether of a questionable nature; a man cannot begin too soon to reform himself, nor too late to attempt reforming the constitutions of society. The abuses of government may always be advantageously corrected by the judicious hand of a wise minister; reforms in a state are always attended with a certain evil, and promise but an uncertain good; they are never recommended but by the young, the thoughtless, the busy, or the interested." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōr-rēct'-ā-ble, † cor-rēct'-ī-ble, a. [Eng. correct; -able.] Capable of being corrected; that may or can be corrected.

"The coldness and windiness, easily correctable with spice..." —Pallier: Worthies; Gloucestershire.

cōr-rēct'-éd, pa. par. or a. [CORRECT, v.]

cōr-rēct'-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [CORRECT, v.] A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of making corrections or amendments; the act of chastising or punishing.

2. Printing: The revising of a proof; the pointing out by means of certain marks any words or letters which require correction; also the altering of the type when a wrong letter, &c. has been used.

correcting-plate, s. [MAGNETIC COMPENSATOR.]

† cōr-rēct'-īng-īŷ, adv. [Eng. correcting; -ly.] In a correcting manner or tone.

"Matthew Moon, men, said Henry Fay, correcting." —T. Hardy: Far from the Maddening Crowd, ch. 5.

cōr-rēc'-tion, * cor-rec-ci-on, * cor-rec-ci-oun, s. [Fr. correction; Ital. correzione; Sp. correccion, from Lat. correctio, from correctus.] [CORRECT, a.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of setting straight or right according to a standard; amendment, improvement.

(1) Of faults of conduct or action:

(2) Of faults of writing, style, language, &c.:

"Another poet, in another age, may take the same liberty with my writings; if, at least, they live long enough to deserve correction." —Dryden: Fables, Pref.

2. The amendment or corrected words substituted for those considered faulty.

"Corrections or improvements should be adjoined, by way of note or commentary, in their proper places." —Watts.

3. The act of reproving or of pointing out faults or mistakes for amendment; animadversion, censure.

"I spoke him also under correction Of you." —Chaucer: Troilus, iii, l. 283.

4. The act of chastising, punishing, or placing under discipline; chastisement.

"Take him to prison, officer: Correction and instruction must both work." —Shaksp.: Measure for Measure, iii, 2.

5. The chastisement, punishment, or discipline suffered for faults committed.

"He goeth... as a fool to the correction of the stocks." —Prov. vii, 22.

6. The counteracting, obviating, or qualifying of the hurtful effects of any ingredient by the admixture or addition of another.

7. That which serves or tends to correct the qualities or effects of any ingredient; a correctory.

II. Printing: The correcting of a proof; the altering of wrong type.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between correction, discipline, and punishment: "Children are the peculiar subjects of correction; discipline and punishment are confined to no age. A wise parent corrects his child; a master maintains discipline in his school; a general preserves discipline in his army. Whoever commits a fault is liable to be punished by those who have authority over him; if he commits a crime he subjects himself to be punished by law. Correction and discipline are mostly exercised by means of chastisement, for which they are often employed as a substitute; punishment is inflicted in any way that gives pain. Correction and discipline are both of them personal acts of authority exercised by superiors over inferiors, but the former is mostly employed by one individual over another; the latter has regard to a number who are the subjects of it directly or indirectly; punishment has no relation whatever to the agent by which the action is performed; it may proceed alike from persons or things. A parent who spares the due correction of his child, or a master who does not use a proper discipline in his school, will alike be punished by the insubordination and irregularities of those over whom they have a control." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ House of correction: A gaol, a penitentiary.

cōr-rēc-tion-al, a. [Fr. correctionnel, from Low Lat. correctionalis, from correctia.] Intended for or tending to correction.

• cōr-rēc-tion-ēr, s. [Eng. correction; -er.] One who has been in a house of correction; a gaol-bird.

"... you filthy famished correctorner, ..." - Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV, v. 4.

cōr-rēc-tive, a. & s. [Fr. correctif; Ital. correctivo; Sp. correctivo.]

A. As adjective:

1. Intended to correct or punish what is wrong.

2. Having the quality or tendency to correct the effects of anything hurtful or noxious. "Melberries are pectoral, corrective of bilious alkali." - Arschwin.

B. As substantive:

• 1. A correctory, punishment, or penalty for any wrong done.

2. Anything having the quality or tendency to correct the effects of anything hurtful or noxious; an antidote. "Some correctives to its evil..." - Burke: French Revol.

• 3. A limitation, restraint, or restriction. "... with certain correctives and exceptions..." - Hale: Origin of Manhood.

cōr-rēc-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. corrective; -ly.] In a corrective or correcting manner.

"The unconsummate blow should back again Correctively diminish his own pate." - Browning: Ring & Book, ix. 423.

cōr-rēc-tive-ness, s. [Eng. corrective; -ness.] The quality of being corrective.

cōr-rēc-tly, adv. [Eng. correct; -ly.]

1. In a correct manner, exactly, according to a fixed rule or standard; in exact accordance with an original or copy.

"... speak as properly and as correctly as most gentlemen..." - Locke: On Education.

2. In accordance with propriety.

3. In accordance with truth and accuracy.

cōr-rēc-t-ness, a. [Eng. correct; -ness.]

1. The quality of being correct or in exact accordance with rules or a fixed standard; exactness, faultlessness; strict accordance with propriety.

"In another nature it would have hardened into mere 'correctness' of conduct..." - Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), xii. 380.

2. Accuracy, truth.

3. Conformity or accord with the rules of art or taste.

cōr-rēc-t-ōr, s. [Eng. correct; -or.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who or that which sets straight or right, or corrects what is wrong. "... an universal reformer and corrector of abuses..." - Swift.

2. One who or that which amends, corrects, or alters by reproof, criticism, or chastisement. "Times! the corrector where our judgments err." - Byron: Child Harold's Pilgrimage, iv. 130.

II. Technically:

1. Med.: An ingredient in a composition, or a drug calculated to counteract or obviate the effects of anything hurtful or noxious; an antidote, a corrective. "... turpentine are correctors of quicksilver, by destroying its fixity, and making it capable of mixture." - Quina.

2. Printing:

(1) One who corrects or revises a proof; a printer's reader. "I remember to have seen, who, by his style and literature, seems to be the corrector of a hedgepress in Little-Britain, proceeding gradually to an author." - Swift.

(2) Also the workman who corrects the type.

3. Telegraphy: A contrivance intended to correct any defect in the type-wheel of a printing telegraph-machine.

"The type-wheel might be slightly out of position, and thus would not print the letter clearly. A wheel with wedge-shaped teeth, known as a corrector, is therefore mounted on the same axis as the type-wheel." - J. M. Wigner, in Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. II, p. 234.

¶ Corrector of the Staple: Old Law: An officer of the Staple who recorded the bargains of merchants made there. (Kersey.)

cōr-rēc-t-ōr-ry, a. & s. [Eng. corrector; -ry.]

A. As adj.: Corrective; having the power or quality of correcting.

B. As subst.: Anything which corrects or amends what is wrong, or counteracts the effects of anything hurtful or noxious; a corrective.

"Pepper is the best correctory for it." - Venner: Via Sicilia ad West-Longum, p. 93.

† cōr-rēc-t-rēss, s. [Eng. corrector; -ess.] A female who corrects.

cōr-rē-gū-dor, s. [Sp., lit. = one who corrects, from corrigir = to correct.] In Spain, the chief magistrate of a town. In Portugal, a magistrate possessing administrative, but no governing, power. (Ogilvie.)

"This noise was occasioned by the arrival of the corrector..." - Smollett: Gil Blas.

• cor-rēl, • cor-rī, s. [Gael.] The low side of a hill, or a hollow between hills, where the game lies. "Fleet foot on the correl." - Scott: The Lady of the Lake, III. 14.

cōr-rēl, a. [CORRAL.]

• cōr-rē-lāte, s. [CORRELATE, v.] One who is reciprocally related to another, as father and son.

"These two are necessarily connected as any two correlates whatever." - Clarke: On the Evidences; Answer to Leibn.

cōr-rē-lāte, v. i. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. relate (q.v.).] To have a reciprocal relation; to be reciprocally related.

"... with the hair the horns are correlated." - Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1869), ch. vi., p. 128.

cōr-rē-lāt-ēd, pa. par. & a. [CORRELATE.]

cōr-rē-lā-tion, s. [From Eng. correlate(e), and suff. -ion; or from Lat., Eng., & c. cor, the same as con, and Eng. relation.]

Of two or more things: The state of being so related to each other that one cannot be altered without the others also undergoing change.

"In monostrophes, the correlations between quite distinct parts are very curious." - Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. I., p. 11.

¶ (1) Correlation of growth: Biol.: (For definition see extract.) "Correlation of growth—I mean by this expression that the whole organization is tied together during its growth and development, that when slight variations in any one part occur, and are accumulated through natural selection, other parts become modified." - Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), ch. v., p. 143.

(2) Correlation of the physical forces: Nat. Phil.: The doctrine that all the forces of nature, heat, light, electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity, and motion are convertible into each other. This view was promulgated in 1842 by Mr. Orove, afterwards Sir W. Grove, F.R.S. The first edition of his work on the Correlation of the Physical Forces appeared in 1846, the fifth in 1867. The doctrine is now accepted as a postulate in natural philosophy.

cōr-rēl-a-tive, a. & s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. relative (q.v.).]

A. As adj.: Reciprocally connected or related, so that the existence of one in a particular state depends on the existence of the other; correlated.

"Father and son, husband and wife, and such other correlative terms, seem nearly to belong one to another." - South.

B. As subst.: One who or that which is correlated to another; a correlate.

"The signs and the things signified are correlatives." - Joyce: Expos. of Daniel, ch. III.

cōr-rēl-a-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. correlative; -ly.] In a correlative manner or relation.

*cor-ti-cā'-tā, s. pl. [Lat., neut. pl. of corticatus = covered with bark.]

Zool.: "Barked corals," corals with bark. A name sometimes applied to corals possessing a fixed calcareous or horny axis of some solidity, from which the fleshy portions project like branches from the stem of a tree. They are now ranked under Zoantharia and Alcyonaria.

cor-ti-cā'te, †cor-ti-cā'tōd, a. [Lat. corticatus = covered with bark.]

Bot.: Coated; harder externally than internally.

"This animal is a kind of lizard, a quadruped corticated. . . ."—Browne's Vulgar Errors.

cor-ti-cō'-īo, a. [Lat. cortex (genit. corticis) = . . . cork.]

corticio acid, s.

Chem.: C<sub>12</sub>H<sub>10</sub>O<sub>8</sub>. An acid found in the alcoholic extract from cork. An amorphous cinnamon-coloured powder, which is precipitated by water from the alcoholic extract. It dissolves in alkalies, forming a deep-red solution.

cor-ti-c'ī-fēr, s. [Lat. cortex (genit. corticis) = cork, and fero = to bear.] One of the Corticata or barked corals.

cor-ti-c'īf-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. cortex (genit. corticis) = bark, and fero = to bear.] Producing bark.

cor-ti-c'ī-form, a. [Lat. cortex (genit. corticis) = bark, and forma = form, appearance.] Of the form or appearance of bark.

cor-ti-c'īn, s. [Lat. cortex (genit. corticis) = bark, and Eng. suff. -in.]

Chem.: An amorphous, tasteless, inodorous powder obtained from the bark of the Aspen, Populus tremula. It is easily soluble in alcohol and in acetic acid, and is precipitated by water or sulphuric acid.

cor-ti-cōse, a. [Lat. corticosis = full of bark.] Full of bark, abounding in bark, corticous.

cor-ti-coūs, a. [Lat. cortex (genit. corticis) = bark, and Eng. suff. -ous.] The same as Corticose (q.v.).

cor-ti-lē, s. [Ital., from Low Lat. cortile, curtile.]

Architecture:

1. A small court surrounded or inclosed by the appurtenances of a building. It was an important feature in the architecture of the early Christian churches or basilicas, and was usually square in plan.

2. The court-yard or area of a dwelling-house.

cor-ti-nā, s. [Lat. = a round vessel, a kettle, a cauldron.]

Bot.: That portion of the velum in a fungal which adheres to the margin of the pollen when the latter is in fragments. (Lindley.) The filamentous ring of some Agarics. (Treas. of Bot.)

cor-tin-ār'-ī-ōūs, s. [Lat. cortina (q.v.), and Eng. suff. -arius, from Lat. suff. -arius.]

Bot.: The same as CORTINATE (q.v.).

cor-tin-ār'-ī-ūs, s. [Lat. cortin(a), and suff. -arius.]

Bot.: A genus of fungals, closely akin to Agaricus. They have a spider-like web, and bright red-brown spores. The species are numerous.

cor-ti-nāte, s. [Lat. cortina (q.v.), and Eng. & suff. -ate.]

Bot.: Having a structure like that of a cobweb; cortinarius.

*cor-tine, *cor-ty-n, s. [CURTAIN.]

"Cast up the cortyna."—Chaucer: C. T., 4, 831.

cor-tū'-sā, s. [Named after J. A. Cortusius, Professor of Botany at Padua.]

Bot.: A genus of Primulaceae, containing but one known species, a plant from the northern and alpine parts of the eastern hemisphere. The radical leaves have long petioles. Inflorescence umbelliferous, the flowers with a tubular 10-toothed calyx; a corolla with a short tube; 5 stamens; and a 5-celled capsule dehiscent from the apex, and giving forth many seeds.

cor-tū'-sāl, a. [Mod. Lat. cortusa (q.v.), and Eng. & suff. -al.]

Bot.: Pertaining to the genus Cortusa, or having it for a type.

† Cortusal Alliance: [CORTUSALES.]

cor-tū-sā'-lēā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. cortusa (q.v.), and pl. suff. -ales.]

Bot. (The Cortusal Alliance): An alliance of perigenous exogens, containing the orders Hydrophyllaceae, Plumbaginaceae, Plantaginaceae, Primulaceae, and Myrsinaceae. The flowers are generally dichlamydeous, monopetalous, and asymmetrical; the placenta free and central; the embryo lying amid much albumen. (Lindley.)

cō-rūn-dēl'-līte, s. [Mod. Lat., & c. corundum; dimin. suff. -ell; and -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: The same as MARGARITE (q.v.).

cō-rūn-dōph'-ī-līte, co-rūn-dōph'-ī-līte, s. [Dana, who gives the form corundophilite, derives it from Lat., & c. corundum, and Gr. φιλος (philos) = a friend. The British Museum Catalogue alters this to corundophyllite, which would be from Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

Min.: A variety of Clinoclone (Brit. Mus. Cat.). Dana, on the contrary, considers Clinoclone as properly separating into two minerals, one of which is Corundophilite. It is a monoclinic mineral crystal, being in double hexagonal prisms. The hardness is 2½; the sp. gr. 2.9; and the colour green; the lustre of the cleavage faces somewhat pearly. Compos.: Silica, 24.0—25.06; alumina, 25.9—30.7; protoxide of iron, 14.8—16.5; magnesia, 16.4—22.7; and water, 10.6—11.9. It has strong double refraction.

cō-rūn-dūm, *co-rūn'-dōn, *co-rī-vin'-dūm, *co-rī-ven'-dūm, s. [Hindust., & c. karund.]

Minerology:

1. Gen.: A rhombohedral transparent or translucent mineral, very tough when compact. Its hardness is 9, its sp. gr. 3.9—4.16. Its lustre is generally vitreous; its colours blue, red, yellow, brown, grey, or nearly white; its streak in all cases colourless. It consists of pure alumina—i. e., oxygen, 46.6, and aluminum, 53.4 = 100. Chemically viewed, it is aluminum-oxide, Al<sub>2</sub>O<sub>3</sub>. There are three varieties of it—Sapphire, Corundum proper, and Emery. (See these words.)

2. Spec. (Corundum proper): It includes the species of the genus which are dark in colour and only translucent. But its hues may be light blue, grey, brown, or black. It is found in many localities in the Appalachian Mountain System of the United States.

*cō-rūs'-cānt, a. [Lat. coruscans, pr. par. of corusco = to gleam, to glitter.] Gleaming, glittering in flashes; flashing.

"His praelas are like those coruscant beams."—Boswell, bk. iv., let. 42.

cōr'-ūs-cāte, v. i. [Lat. coruscatus, pa. par. of corusco = to gleam, to glitter, to flash.] To gleam, to glitter in flashes, to flash.

" . . . more coruscating and enlightening than any other matter. . . ."—Greenhill: Art of Enamelling, p. 331.

cōr'-ūs-cā-tion, s. [Lat. coruscatio, from coruscatus, pa. par. of corusco.]

1. Lit.: A flash, a sudden gleam or burst of light in the clouds or atmosphere; or a brilliant radiation.

"We see that lightnings and coruscations, which are near at hand, yield no sound."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

2. Fig.: A brilliant display of intellectual power or wit.

"There are beautiful coruscations of fancy."—Hatlam.

corve, s. [CORF.]

*cor-vēe', s. [Fr., from Low Lat. corvada, corroada, corroala, corrogala, from Lat. corrogo = to ask together: cor = cum = with, together; and rogo = to ask.]

Feudal Law: An obligation on the tenants or inhabitants of certain districts to perform certain services for their lord, such as the maintenance of roads, &c. Extended so as to include the forced labour of the fellahen in Egypt. Applied also to the labour thus exacted.

cor'-ven, pa. par. or a. [CARVE.]

corveg, s. pl. [CORF.]

cor-vētte', *cor'-vēt, s. [Fr. corvette; Port. & Sp. corveta; Lat. corbita = a slow-sailing vessel; corbita = a basket.]

Naut.: A man-of-war, having a flush deck, and carrying from eighteen to twenty-six guns in one tier. It ranks next below a frigate (q.v.).

" . . . a corvette, as he called it, of Calais, which hath been taken by the English."—Sidney: State Papers, Lett. (1636), vol. II. 456.

cor-vēt-tō (1), s. [CORVETTE.]

cor-vēt-tō (2), s. [ITAL.]

● Manege: A curvet (q.v.).

"You must draw the horse in his career with his mane, and turn, doing the corvetto and leaping."—Peacham: On Drawing.

cor'-vi-dēs, s. pl. [Lat. corvus (q.v.), and suff. -idae.]

Ornith.: A family of coracioid birds containing the crows and their allies. The bill is strong, more or less compressed; the upper mandible to a certain extent curved, the tip notched; the nostrils are covered with stiff bristle-like feathers pointing forward. They can walk, run, or fly with equal ease. Their nest is of sticks, lined with soft materials. They may be divided into five sub-families: (1) Streperinae, or Piping Crows; (2) Garrulinae, or Jays; (3) Callaeinae, or Tree Crows; (4) Corvinae, or True Crows; and (5) Pyrrhocoracinae. (See these words.)

cor-vi-nēs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. corvus (q.v.), Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inēs.]

Ornith.: The typical sub-family of the Corvidae (q.v.). British genera are Corvus (Crow), Pica (Magpie), Garroulus (Jay), and Nucifraga (Nutcracker) (q.v.).

cor'-vine, a. [Lat. corvinus = pertaining to the raven.] Pertaining to any of the crows.

*cor'-vō-rant, s. [See def.] An obsolete form of cormorant (q.v.), due to erroneous derivation.

"The shags bring our corvorant or water-crow."—Cooke: Voyages, vol. VI., bk. IV., ch. II.

cor'-vūs, s. [Lat. = a raven . . . the constellation Corvus.]

1. Ornith.: The typical genus of the sub-family Corvinae and the family Corvidae. The bill is straight, large, compressed, convex, and curved towards the point; the nostrils are open; the fourth quill of the wings the longest; the tail even-rounded or rectilinear. There are many species of the genus, and they are scattered over the world. There are five in Britain: (1) Corvus corax, the Raven; (2) C. corone, the Carrion Crow; (3) C. cornix, the Hooded Crow or Royston Crow; (4) C. frugilegus, the Rook; and (5) C. monedula, the Jackdaw. The common Crow of India is C. splendens [CROW, RAVEN, ROOK, &c.].

2. Palaeont.: Representatives of the genus Corvus occur from the Miocene onward.

3. Astron.: One of the fifteen ancient southern constellations. Sometimes it is combined with Hydra, another of the fifteen, and figures as Hydra and Corvus. Yet another, viz., Crater, the Cup, has been superadded, but this is obsolete.

cōr-ŷ-bānt (pl. † corybantēs), cōryban-tes (Lat.), s. [Gr. κορυβαντες (korubantes), genit. κορυβαντος (korubantos).] A priest of the goddess Cybele, in Phrygia, whose rites were accompanied with wild music, dancing, &c.

* cōr-ŷ-bānt-ŷ-asm, s. [Eng. corybant; † connective; and suff. -asm.]

Med.: A kind of frenzy in which the patient is affected with fantastic visions and want of sleep. (Dunglison.)

cōr-ŷ-bān-tic, * cōr-ŷ-bān-tick, a. [Gr. κορυβαντικός (korubantikos) = pertaining to the Corybantēs.]

1. Lit.: Of or relating to the Corybantēs or their rites.

2. Fig.: Mad, frenzied, frantic.

cō-ryc-ŷ-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. corycium (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Orchids, tribe Ophreæ.

cō-ry-cŷ-ŷ-um, s. [From Gr. κόρυς (korus) = a helmet, which the flower somewhat resembles. (Loudon, Paston, &c.) It is not rather from κόρυκον (korukion), dimin. of κόρυκος (korukos) = a leathern sack or wallet for provisions?]

Bot.: A genus of Orchids, the typical one of the family Ophreæ. It has saccata petals, and the lateral sepals connate. Nine or ten species are known, all from the Cape of Good Hope.

* cōr-ŷ-dā-ŷ-a, s. [CORVADALIS.]

Chem.: The same as CORYDALINE (q.v.).

cōr-ŷ-d-a-line, † cōr-ŷ-d-a-ŷ-ŷ-ina, s. [Mod. Lat. corydalis (q.v.), and suff. -ine, -ina (Chem.).]

Chem.: A weak organic base, C<sub>18</sub>H<sub>19</sub>NO<sub>4</sub>. Corydaline occurs in the roots of Corydalis bulbosa, C. fabacea, and Aristolochia cava. The root is exhausted with water containing hydrochloric acid, the solution precipitated by sodium carbonate, the precipitate dried and treated with alcohol, and the solution allowed to crystallize. Corydaline crystallizes in colourless needles, which melt at 130°. Nitric acid converts it into a red-brown resin. Corydaline is insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol, forming a bitter solution. Concentrated sulphuric acid dissolves it, following a dark orange solution.

cōr-ŷ-d-a-lis, s. [From Gr. κορυδαλλίς (korudallis) = the crested lark, the spur of which those of the fumitories somewhat resemble.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Fumariaceæ, tribe Fumariæ. There are four petals, one of them gibbous and spurred at the base; the ovary has many ovules; the pod is two-valved, compressed, many-seeded, the seeds with a crest. Corydalis claviculata, the White Climbing Corydalis, is indigenous to Britain, especially on the walls and roofs of houses in the Highlands of Scotland. It has long, very slender, much-branched stems, pinnate leaves, the petioles ending in tendrils; the flowers small, pale yellow, almost white. C. solida and lutea are not indigenous to Britain, though they have here and there escaped from gardens. The tubers of C. tuberosa contain a peculiar alkali called Corydaline (q.v.). C. bulbosa has an aromatic tuber very bitter, and at the same time somewhat astringent and acrid. It was formerly used as a substitute for the Birthworts in expelling intestinal worms and as an emmenagogue.

† Climbing Corydalis:

(1) Corydalis claviculata. [CORYDALIS.]

(2) An American name for Adlumina. (Treas. of Bot.)

cōr-ŷ-l-ā-qō-æ, s. pl. [Lat. corylus (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -æce.]

Bot.: Mastworts. An order of diclinous exogens, alliance Quercuales. It consists of trees and shrubs with alternate, simple, ex-stipulate leaves, often with the veins running straight from the midrib to the margin. Male flowers amentaceous, with 5 to 20 stamens; female having the ovary crowned by the rudiments of an adherent calyx, seated within a coriaceous involucre called a cupule; or vary with two or more cells; ovules pendulous or peltate. Among the genera are Carpinus (Hornbeam), Corylus (Hazel), Fagus (Beech), Castanea (Chestnut), and Quercus (Oak). Found in the temperate parts of the Old and New Worlds. In the tropics they grow chiefly on mountains. In 1844 Lindley enumerated eight genera, and estimated the species at 265.

cōr-ŷ-lōph-ŷ-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. corylophus, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of pentamerous beetles. Type, Corylophus.

cōr-ŷ-l-ōph-ŷ-s, s. [Gr. κόρυς (korus) = a helmet, and λόφος (lophos) = the back of the neck, . . . a crest.]

Entom.: A genus of beetles, the typical one of the family Corylophidæ. Sharp enumerates two British species.

cōr-ŷ-l-ŷ-s, s. [Lat. corylus; Gr. κόρυλος (korulos), from κόρυς (korus) = a helmet, the fruit appearing as if covered with one.]

1. Bot.: The Hazel-nut. A genus of trees, the typical one of the order Corylaceæ. The barren flowers are in a cylindrical catkin, the scales 3-cleft, the middle lobe covering the two side ones; stamens three, with one-called anthers. Fertile flowers 1 or 2 together, within a minute involucre of 2 to 3 cohering, lacerated, hairy scales, the whole constituting a short catkin; stigmas two, filiform; nut invested with the enlarged united scales of the involucre. Corylus Avellana is the Common Hazel-nut or Hazel (q.v.).

2. Palæo-botany: A species of Corylus is found in the Miocene.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-ŷ, * cōr-ŷ-ŷ-ŷ-bū-s, s. [Lat. corymbus = a cluster of ivy berries, or of fruit or flowers; Gr. κόρυμβος (korumbos) = the uppermost point, head, or end.]

Botany:

* 1. In Pliny what is now called a capitulum. This is not the corymb of modern botanists.

"Amongst the ancient botanists, it was used to express the bunches or clusters of berries of ivy; amongst modern botanists, it is used for a compounded discous flower, whose seeds are not papous, or do not fly away in down; such are the flowers of daisies, and common marygold."-Quincy.

2. A kind of inflorescence, akin to the racemes in having stalked flowers, but differing in having the lower pedicels so long that their flowers are elevated to the same level as those of the upper ones. Examples, the Wallflower, the Elder, &c.

CORYMB, ELDER TREE.

† † Compound Corymb:

Bot.: A corymb the expansion of which is centrifugal instead of centripetal, i.e., it commences at the centre instead of the circumference. A branched corymb, each of whose divisions is corymbose, is more generally called a Fascicle (q.v.).

* cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bī-āte, cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bī-āt-ēd, a. [Lat. corymbus, † connective, and suff. -ate, -ated.] Garnished with branches (bunches?) of berries. (Johnson.)

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bīf-ēr-æ, s. pl. [Lat. fem. pl. of corymbifer = bearing clusters of ivy berries, from corymbus [CORYMB], and fero = to bear.]

Bot.: The name given in 1789 by Jussieu to the sub-order of Composite plants afterwards called Asteraceæ. It is one of three sub-orders of Composites, the others being Cynarocéphalæ and Cichoraceæ.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bīf-ēr-ōus, a. [Lat. corymbus = . . . a corymb; fero = to bear; and Eng. suff. -ous.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: Bearing fruit or berries on branches. (Johnson.)

2. Bot.: Bearing corymbes.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bī-tēs, s. [Lat. corymbites; Gr. κορυμβίτης (korumbitēs) = a plant, Euphorbia platyphyllos.]

Entom.: A genus of Elateridæ. Ten species are found in Britain. (Sharpe.)

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bōsæ, a. [Mod. Lat. corymbosus, from Lat. corymbus [CORYMB], and suff. -osus.]

Bot.: Pertaining to or consisting of the inflorescences called a corymb, or having a structure resembling it. Thus there may be a corymbose panicle, and even the brschoes in a plant may be corymbose.

† Corymbose raceme:

Bot.: A corymb elongated to a raceme. Ex., the Candy-tuft, Iberis.

† cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bōsæ-ŷ-ŷ, adv. [Eng. corymbosæ; -ly.]

Bot.: In a corymbose manner.

† cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bōŷ-s, a. [Eng. corymb; -ous.]

Bot.: The same as CORYMBOSE (q.v.).

† cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bū-lōsæ, a. [Dimin. of corymbus, and Eng. suff. -ose, from Lat. -osus.]

Bot.: Having, containing, or consisting of a small corymb.

* cōr-ŷ-ŷ-bū-lōŷ-s, a. [Dimin. of Lat. corymbus, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: The same as CORYMBULOSE (q.v.).

cō-ry-nē-s, s. [Gr. κορνίη (korunē) = a club. So named because the tentacles are sometimes club-shaped.]

Zool.: A family of marine Hydroid Polypes, the typical one of the family Coryniadæ.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-nē-tēs, s. [Gr. κορνιήτης (korunētēs) = a club-bearer, a mace-bearer.]

Entom.: A genus of Beetles, family Cleridæ. Four species are found in Britain. (Sharpe.)

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-nē-ŷ-ŷ, s. [Gr. κορνίη (korunē) = a club, and Lat. neut. suff. -um.]

Bot.: A genus of coniomycetous fungals, growing on dead twigs. It has dark naked spores radiating from a receptacle.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-n-ŷ-dæ, s. [Gr. κορνίη (korunē) = a club, and εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

Zool.: A member of the order Corynida (q.v.).

"More recently a supposed Coryniid called Palæocoryna has been described from the Carboniferous rocks of Scotland."-Nicholson: Zool., ch. xii.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-n-ŷ-dæ, s. pl. [CORVNIID.]

1. Zool.: An order of Hydrozoa, sub-class Hydroida. The animal is simple, consisting of a single polypite; or if compound, then of several polypites, united by a common flesh or cœnosarc. The reproductive organs are in the form of gynophores. They are sometimes called also Tubularia or Pipe Coralines.

2. Palæont.: They occur fossil in various formations.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-n-ŷ-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coryn(e), and suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of marine Hydroid Polypes, in which the animals are naked or have only the rudiments of a polypidom. They are now generally elevated into an order, Corynida (q.v.).

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-n-ŷ-d-ŷ-ŷ, s. pl. [Gr. κορνίη (korunē) = a club, and εἶδος (eidos) = form: dimia. of κορνίη (korunē).]

Bot.: Processes stuck into the margin of the germinating leaf of ferns and containing spiral threads.

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-n-ŷ-ŷ-ŷ, s. [Gr. κορνίη (korunē) = a club, and Eng. suff. -ite (Min.) (q.v.).]

Min.: An isometric mineral crystallizing in octahedrons, with convex faces or globularly. Its hardness is 4.5-5; the sp. gr. 5.9-6; the lustre metallic; the colour silvery white, or on a fresh fracture steel-grey. Compos.: Arsenic, 37.83; antimony, 13.45; sulphur, 17.19; nickel, 28.80; and iron, 1.98. Found in Carinthia. (Dana.)

cōr-ŷ-ŷ-n-ŷ-d-car-pūs, s. [Gr. κορνίη (korunē) = a club, and καρπός (karpos) = fruit.]

Bot. : A genus of trees, order Myrsinaceae. They have entire smooth leaves and clusters of white flowers. They are native of New Zealand. The fruits of Corynocarpus vulgaris are used in that country in times of scarcity, but the seeds, unless steamed and otherwise treated, are poisonous.

cōr-ŷ-phā, s. [Gr. κορυφή (koruphē) = the top, because the leaves are only at the summit of the tree.]

Bot. : A genus of palms, the type of the tribe Corypheae (q.v.). They have fan-shaped leaves, perfect flowers on branching bracteate spikes, three petals, six stamens, and a one-seeded berry fruit. About five species are known, all from tropical Asia. Corypha umbra culifera is the Talipot-tree. [TALIPOT.]

cōr-ŷ-phās-nā, s. [Gr. κορυφαία (koruphaina) = a fish, the same as ἵππουρος (hippouros) = horse-tail, i.e., the Coryphæna hippurina described below.]

Ichthy. : A genus of Scomberidae, or by some it is made the type of a family Coryphænidae (q.v.). The head is greatly elevated, and the palate and jaws both furnished with teeth. Coryphæna hippurina and several other species are found in the Mediterranean and the adjacent parts of the Atlantic. They pursue the flying fish. The first-named species is the one of the two animals called the Dolphin. It has beautiful metallic tints, looking golden while in the water. It is about five feet long.

CORYPHÆNA HIPPURINA.

cōr-ŷ-phæn-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coryphæna (q.v.), and suff. -īdæ.]

Zool. : A family of spiny-finned fishes. They have a dorsal fin running along the whole length of the back; the ventral fins are small or wanting; the dorsal and anal fins are generally high. All the species are marine. [CORYPHÆNA.]

cōr-ŷ-phē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coryphæ(a), and suff. -æ.]

Bot. : A tribe of Palms, of which the type is Corypha. It is divided into two families, Sabalidæ and Phœnicidæ.

cōr-ŷ-phē-ō, s. [Fr.] A ballet-dancer. [CORYPHÆUS.]

cōr-ŷ-phē-ūs, cōr-ŷ-phē-ūs, s. [Gr. κορυφαῖος (koruphaios) = (a) at the top or head, (s.) the leader of the chorus in the Attic drama; κορυφή (koruphē) = a head.]

1. Lit. : The leader of a chorus or company in a play.

* 2. Fig. : The leader of any party.
"That noted corypheus (Dr. John Owen) of the Independent faction."—South: Serm. v. 49.

¶ In the University of Oxford the Assistant of the Choragus or Master of Musical Praxis is called the Coryphæus or Præcentor.

cō-rŷph-ō-dōn, s. [Gr. χορυφή (choruphē) = a point, and ὀδούς (odous), genit. ὀδόντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Palæont. : A genus of ungulate mammals, the typical one of the family Coryphodontidæ. The genus was founded by Prof. Owen on fragmentary materials. He showed its resemblance to the Tapirs. From the ampler remains obtained in North America, Marsh has proved that there were five toes. This necessitates the removal of the genus from the Tapiridæ. Found in the Eocene of Europe and North America.

cō-rŷph-ō-dōn-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. coryphodon (genit. coryphodontis), and suff. -īdæ.]

Palæont. : A family of ungulate mammals. Only known genus, Coryphodon (q.v.).

cō-rŷs-tēs, s. [Gr. κορυστής (korustēs) = a helmeted man, an armed warrior.]

Zool. : A genus of Brachyurona (Short-tailed) Crustacea. The chela (i.e., the anterior feet) are in the males about twice as long as the body; in the females they are not remarkably long.

cō-rŷs-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. corystes (q.v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -īdæ.]

Zool. : A family of Brachyurous Crustaceans. Type Corystes (q.v.).

cōr-ŷ-thā-ix, s. [Gr. κορυθαίξ (koruthaix) = a helmet shaking with waving plume: κόρυς (korus) = a helmet, and αἰσός (aisos) = to move quickly, to dart.]

Ornith. : A genus of birds, family Musophagidæ. It contains the Touracos. They are African birds with a green body, and the quill feathers of the wings and tail violet or red.

cō-rŷ-za, s. [Lat. coryza; Gr. κόρυζα (koruzā), from κόρυς (korus) = the side of the head.]

Med. : A "cold in the head," with running at the nose, defluxion of phlegm, &c.

cōs (1), † coss, s. [Maharatta, &c.] A measure of distance in India, averaging about two English miles. (Anglo-Indian.)

Cōs (2), s. [The name of an island in the Mediterranean, belonging to Turkey.]

cos-lettuce, s.

Bot. : A curly variety of lettuce introduced from the island of Cos.

* cōs (3), * cosse, * kosse, s. [A.S. cos.] A kiss, an embrace. [KISS.]

"A suete cos of thy mouth."
Lyrical Poems, p. 92.

cōs-al-ite, s. [Named from Cosala, in the province of Sinaloa, in Mexico, where it is found.]

Min. : A soft and brittle mineral of a metallic lustre and a lead-grey colour, consisting of sulphur 16.10, bismuth 42.25, and lead 41.65. (Dana.) The British Museum Catalogue makes it the same as REZBANYTE (q.v.).

* cosche (1), * cosh, s. [COSSHE.]

* cosche (2), s. [Fr. coche.] A coach.
"In cosche traynd with alander."—Hume: Charact. S. P., iii. 352.

cōs-cin-ī-ŷm, s. [Gr. κοσκίνιον (koskinion), dimin. of κόσκινον (koskionon) = a sieve.]

Bot. : A genus of plants, order Menioperaceae. An infusion of the wood and bark of Coscinium indicum is regarded as furnishing an excellent stomachic. C. fenestratum is used in Ceylon as a tonic and diuretic. It is called Weni-vel.

cōs-cin-ō-dis-ōus, s. [Gr. κόσκινον (koskionon) = a sieve, and δίσκος (diskos) = a quoit.]

Bot. : A genus of Diatomaceae, with free frustules and areolar valves, beautiful to the view. About forty-one species are known, four of them British. Others are fossil in Virginia, Bermuda, &c., in recent rocks. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

* cōs-cin-ō-mān-ŷŷ, * cōs-kīn-ō-mān-ŷŷ, s. [Gr. κόσκινον (koskionon) = a sieve, and μαντεία (mantēia) = prophecy, divination.] A kind of divination effected by means of a sieve which was either suspended or fixed on the point of a pair of shears. The diviner then uttered a certain formula, and repeated the names of any persons suspected of a crime. If the sieve moved at the mention of any name, that person was considered as guilty.

* coso, * coisa, * coss, * coysse, v. t. [Perhaps a corruption of choose (q.v.).] To exchange, to give or take in barter.

"The traitor Aethes With him has helmes cosit, and gait him his."
Douglas: Virgil, 258. 33.

cō-sē-cant, s.

[Eng. co, a contraction for complement first introduced by Gunter, and secant (q.v.).]

Geom. : The secant of the complement of an arc or angle — i.e., the secant of the arc or angle necessary to make the cosecant of the other one up to 90°. Let A C B be a quadrant, then the arcs A E and E C are complements of each other; so also are the angles A B E and E B C. Let C D be a tangent to the quadrant or the circle of which it constitutes a part, then B D is the secant of the arc E C or the angle E B C, and the cosecant of the arc E A or the angle E B A.

cō-scis-maj, a. & s. [Lat. co = together, and Gr. σεισμός (seismos) = an earthquake.]

A. As adj. : Pertaining to the line described under B.

B. As subst. : The line in which a wave "shell" reaches the earth at the same time. (Rossier.) [SEISMOLOGY.]

* cōs-ŷn, a. & s. [COZEN, COUSIN.]

cōs-ŷn-age (age as īg), s. [COSINAGE, COZENAGE.]

cōs-ŷn-īng, s. [COZENING.]

* cō-sen-ti-ent (ti as shi), a. [Pref. co = cum = with, together, and Eng. sentient (q.v.).] Perceiving with or together.

* coserl, s. [Scotch cois, cois = to bargain, and suff. -ri = -ry.] Bargaining, traffic.
"To carpo of coserl, whence capitans are taken."
Morte Arthure, 1,882.

cō-ŷey, cō-ŷŷ, a. & s. [Ety. doubtful.]
A. As adj. : Sngg, comfortable, warm.
B. As subst. : A padded covering for a teapot, put over it to retain the heat.

* cosh, s. [COSSHE.]

* cosh, a. [Ety. doubtful.] [COSEX.]

- 1. Sngg, comfortable.
- 2. Intimate, well acquainted.

* coshe, s. [COACEL.]

cōsh-ēr, v. t. [co = to eat = a feast, a banquet.]
1. Ord. Lang. : To treat kindly; to welcome, to make comfortable.

"Such a worthy guest to cosh."
Irish Hudibras. (Nares.)

2. Old Irish Feudal Law : To levy certain taxes on; to demand coshering from.

* cōsh-ēr-ēr, s. [Eng. cosher; -er.] One who practised coshering.

"... idle cosherers who claimed to be descended from good Irish families."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xli.

cōsh-ēr-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [COSHER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj. : (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

Old Irish Feudal Law : A custom whereby the lord was entitled to exact from his tenant food and lodging for himself and his followers at the tenant's house. It was in connection with this practice of coshering, to which the political circumstances of Ireland from time to time gave an unhappy stimulus, that the word Tory arose. [TORY.]

"... many of the native aristocracy whose lives had been spent in coshering or manuring."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xli.

* cōsh-ēr-ŷ, s. [Eng. cosher; -y.] The same as COSHERINO (q.v.).

* cōsh-īŷ, adv. [Scotch cosh, and Eng. suff. -ly.] Snggly, comfortably, cosily.

* cosie, s. [CASSIE.]

* cō-sī-ēr, * cō-zī-ēr, s. [Fr. coudre (pa. par. cousu) = to patch, to sew; Lat. con = cum = with, together, and sud = to sew.] A botcher, a patcher, a cobbler.
"... ye squeak out your cosiers catches..."—Shakspeare: Twelfth Night, li. 8.

* cō-sig-nif-ī-cā-tive, a. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. significative (q.v.).] Having the same signification or meaning. (Cockerm.)

cō-sig-ni-tā-rŷ, cō-sig-ni-tōr-ŷ, a. & s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. signatory (q.v.).]

A. As adj. : Signing any document, especially a treaty, in conjunction with another.

B. As subst. : One who signs any document, especially a treaty, in conjunction with others.

cō-sī-ŷlŷ, * cō-sī-ŷlŷ, adv. [Eng. cosy; -ly.] Snggly, comfortably.

"Cautly and cosily I lie."
Hamlet: Poems, l. 74.

* cosin, * cosyn, s. & a. [COUSIN.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wō, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sir, marine; gō, pōt, er, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rāle, fūll; try, Sŷrian. sō, cō = ō. oŷ = ā. qu = kw.

*cos'-in-age, *cos'-en-age, *cos-yn-age, s. [Fr. cosinage = kindred.] [COOSIN.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Kindred, relationship; the condition of being related as cousins.

"Not for no cosynage ne alliance." Chaucer: C. T., 14, 550.

2. Relations, connections.

"Alle hys brotheren, and al his cosynage." Wycliffe: Eccl. 1. 6.

3. A nation, race, or family.

"In thee shal be blisyd alle cosynages of the erthe." Wycliffe: Genesis xii. 4.

II. Law:

1. Kindred or relationship by blood.

2. A writ to recover possession of any estates for the rightful heir from a stranger who has entered and abated, after the death of the testator, or the grandfather's grandfather, or other collateral relation.

cos'-sine, s. [Eng. co, a contraction for complement, and sine.]

Geom.: The sine of the complement of an arc or angle. Let A E D be a quadrant, divided into the two arcs A E and E D, which are complements of each other;

then E C, which is the sine of the arc E D, is the cosine of A E. E C is the sine also of the angle E B C, and the cosine of A B E.

¶ Law of the cosine:

Physics: The law that the intensity of oblique rays is proportional to the cosine of the angle which these rays form with the normal to the surface. M. M. Desains and De la Provostaye have shown that it is true only within very narrow limits—viz., only with bodies like lampblack, destitute of reflecting power. (Ganot.)

¶ The law of the cosine cannot, therefore, be rendered available exactly to measure the diminution in the intensity of radiant heat for each degree that the sun declines. As stated, the law is true only of bodies destitute of reflective power where the solar rays are not.

*cos'-ing-nage, s. [A corruption of Fr. cosinage.]

1. A relation by blood. (Scotch.)

2. A granddaughter or niece. (Scotch.)

cos-már'-y-úm, s. [Gr. κοσμήριον (kosmáirion), dimin. of κόσμος (kosmos)]

Bot.: A genus of Desmidiaceae. It has single cells, constructed in the middle. Rabenhorst describes seventy-seven European species, several of which are British. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

cos-mét'-yo, *cos-mét'-yok, a, & s. [Fr. cosmétique, from Gr. κοσμητικός (kosmētikos) = skilled in decoration, from κοσμέω (kosmeō) = to decorate, to adorn; κόσμος (kosmos) = order, beauty.]

A. As adjective:

1. Skilled in dressing or adorning the hair, skin, &c.

"One of this useful profession [a barber] this order of cosmetick philosophers." Tatler, No. 24.

2. Pertaining to or used for the dressing or adorning of the hair, skin, &c.

"I was never permitted to sleep till I had passed through the cosmetick discipline." Johnson: Rambler, No. 150.

B. As substantive:

1. Lit.: Any preparation used to make and preserve the skin soft, clear, and white; an artificial help to beautify the complexion.

¶ Many cosmetics, though improving the complexion for the moment, injure it at last. The best of them is a poor substitute for that beauty which fresh air, exercise, temperance, regularity of habits, contentment, and piety tend to produce.

"The oil of the canoe is used as a cosmetic by the ladies to remove wrinkles and sun-burnings." Granger: The Sugar-Cane, 137 (Note).

* 2. Fig.: Anything which will preserve the clearness, openness, or frankness of the countenance.

"No better cosmetics than a severe temperance and purity, modesty and humility, a gracious temper and calmness of spirit . . ." Bay: On the Creation.

*cos'-mēt'-yo-al, a. [Eng. cosmetic; -al.] Used for beautifying, adorning, or improving. " . . . the cosmetical (but to my aims truly vital) parts of it." Boyle: Works, vol. vi., p. 77.

cos'-mī-a, s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = well ordered, from κόσμος (kosmos) = order.]

Entom.: A genus of moths, the typical one of the family Cosmiidae (q.v.). There are four British species. Cosmia trapezina is a greyish ochreous or reddish ochreous moth, abundant everywhere. The larva is fond of other caterpillars. (Stainton.)

cos'-míc, cos'-míc-al, a. [Gr. κοσμικός (kosmikos) = of the world or universe, from κόσμος (kosmos) (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Gen.: Pertaining to the universe, or to the laws through which its beautiful order is maintained.

(2) Specially:

(a) Pertaining to this earth.

(b) Pertaining to the solar system of which it constitutes a part.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Beautifully ordered

(2) Requiring for its development a great space of time.

II. Astron.: Rising or setting with the sun, as opposed to acronychal.

¶ Cosmic speed:

Astron.: Speed like that of the planets, meteors, or such other heavenly bodies. (Ogilvie, ed. Annals.)

cos'-míc-al-ly, adv. [Eng. cosmical; -ly.]

Astron.: With the sun; not acronychally. (Used of a star which rises or sets with the sun.)

cos-mī'-i-dæ, *cos-mí-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. cosmia, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Moths, sub-section Noctuidæ. The wings are of moderate size; the antennæ generally simple; the abdomen smooth, slender in the male; anterior wings rather pointed at the tip; wings in repose forming a very inclined roof; larva elongate, bright coloured, rather flattened beneath; living between the united leaves of trees. Genera, Cosmia and Tethea. Only eight British species. (Stainton.)

*cos'-mō-crāt, s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and κρατέω (kratéō) = to rule, to govern.] A prince of this world.

"You will not think, great cosmocrat . . ." Southey: The Devil's Walk.

cos'-mōg'-ōn-al, a. [Gr. κοσμογόνος (kosmogonos) = creating the world, and Eng., &c. suff. -al.] Relating to cosmogony, relating to the commencement of the world; cosmogonical.

cos-mō-gōn'-ic, cos-mō-gōn'-ic-al, a. [Gr. κοσμογόνος (kosmogonos) = creating the world.] Relating to cosmogony (q.v.).

cos-mōg'-ōn-ist, s. [Ger. kosmogonist, from Gr. κοσμογονία (kosmogonia).] [COSMOGONY.] One who speculates on the origin of the world.

" . . . cosmogonists were not at all restricted in building their systems to the agency of known causes." Lyell: Princip. of Geol., ch. iii.

cos-mōg'-ōn-ý, s. [Fr. cosmogonie; Sp. & Port. cosmogonia, all from Gr. κοσμογονία (kosmogonia) = the creation or origin of the world; κόσμος (kosmos) = order, . . . the world [κόσμος (kosmos) = that which is begotten, a child, . . . a begetting; γόνομα (gonoma) = to be produced, to become; root γενέω (genēō) or γεν (gen), Sans. gán.] The origin or creation of the world; an investigation or dissertation regarding it.

¶ Cosmogony and geology, though having certain relations to each other, are still distinct, cosmogony inquiring into the first origin of things, and geology commencing at a period when, that origin having taken place, successive events in the earth's history began to leave behind them memorials from which their character might be more or less clearly reasoned out. Various epochs may be traced in its history.

(1) Ancient Cosmogony unmodified by the Bible: The subject more or less occupied speculative minds in most ancient countries, and a work formally named κοσμογονία (kosmogonia) was published by a Greek poet and philosopher, Parmenides, believed to have written about 503 B.C. A prevalent opinion among the most ancient theologians—Egyptians, Hindus, Greek, and Roman—was that the world was created by the Supreme Being. Various philosophers, on the contrary, whose attachment to the creed of their respective countries was but nominal, believed in the eternity of the world. The acceptance of this latter tenet did not necessarily exclude belief in a Supreme Being. Thus Plato held at the same time that there was a Supreme Intelligence, and that matter was eternal, thought not created by the Supreme Being, He operated on it and fashioned it according to His will. Successive creations and catastrophes of the world were held to have occurred, and its ultimate destruction or renovation by fire was also expected.

(2) Jewish & Christian Cosmogony: The doctrine of the eternity of matter disappeared wherever the new phase of belief arose, for the teaching of the Old Testament was precise: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1. 1). See also the whole of Gen. 1., with Exod. xx. 11.

(3) Jewish & Christian Cosmogony blended with independent speculation: While geology was in its infancy, it gave its strength to cosmogonical inquiry, with the result of generating controversies which continued century after century. They were terminated, not by the settlement of the question in dispute, but by the wise resolve of those engaged in it, or at least of the higher minds among them, to confine their inquiries, at least for a time, to geological facts, and reconstruct, as far as it was practicable, the past history of the globe, before speculating as to its origin. Metaphysicians like Kant took up the abandoned field, but without notable result.

(4) Semi-scientific Cosmogony: Geologists have shown some tendency to return to cosmogological speculation, with the aid of the vastly increased number of facts which the investigations of the last half century have accumulated. The revival of the nebular hypothesis of La Place was a return to cosmogonical speculation. [NEBULAR HYPOTHESIS.] The efforts made by Sir William Thomson (afterwards Lord Kelvin), Prof. Tait, and others, to ascertain by a study of the sun what fund of bygone time geologists can draw upon, also fall within the province of cosmogony.

cos-mōg'-raph-ēr, s. [Gr. κοσμογράφος (kosmograpfos) = cosmographer, and Eng. suff. -er.] One who describes the broader features of the world without descending to details; one who studies or writes on cosmography (q.v.).

"The cosmographers, which first discovered and described the roundness of the earth." Robert Bacon: Pilum Ludgrinth, § 7.

cos-mō-grāph'-ic, cos-mō-grāph'-ic-al, a. [Fr. cosmographique, from Gr. κοσμογράφος (kosmograpfos) = describing the world, and Eng. suff. -ic, -ical.] Describing the world; pertaining to cosmography.

cos-mō-grāph'-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. cosmographical; -ly.] In a cosmographical manner; in a manner tending to describe the world.

cos-mōg'-raph-ý, s. [Fr. cosmographie, from Gr. κοσμογραφία (kosmograpfia) = a description of the world; κόσμος (kosmos) = order, . . . the world or universe, and γραφή (graphē) = delineation, description.] A description of the system of the universe, or of this world, without descending to details except as these illustrate general principles. Thus a statement as to the uniform angle or direction at which the pole of the earth is slanted in every part of its orbit ought to be stated under cosmography, since it is the essential fact on which the alternation of the seasons depends; but that Ceylon is an island at the southern apex of the Indian peninsula is a mere detail properly relegated to geography. When, again, the causes of the appearances described under cosmography are investigated, the science becomes Cosmology (q.v.). These distinctions have often been ignored by writers on "cosmography," whose works in some cases have differed little from treatises on geography.

ból, bóy; póut, jówl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = həl, dəl.

*cōs'-mō-lābe, s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and λαβ (lab), the root of λαμβάνω (lambano) = to take.]

Astron.: An instrument for taking the angles between the heavenly bodies and their height. It was called also a Pantacosm, and was nearly the same as the Astrolabe.

cōs-mōl'-ē-trū, s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and λατρεία (latreia) = (1) the state of a hired workman, service, servitude, (2) divine worship; λατρεύω (latreúō) = to work for hire or pay; λατρός (latros) = a workman for hire, a hired servant.] The worship of the world. In some cases it might rest on a foundation of pantheistic belief.

cōs-mō-lōg'-iō-al, a. [Eng. cosmology(y); -ical.] Relating to cosmology (q.v.).

cōs-mōl'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. cosmology(y); -ist.] One who studies cosmology.

cōs-mōl'-ō-gy, s. [Fr. cosmologie; Gr. κωσμολογία (kosmologia) (Liddell & Scott): κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and λόγος (logos) = . . . a discourse.] The science which investigates the causes by which the beautiful order of the universe, the solar system, or the earth has been produced, as distinct from Cosmography and Cosmogony (q.v.). Sir Charles Lyell considers Cosmology and Cosmogony identical, and they are at least closely akin. If cosmology investigates the secondary causes by which the present order of the universe is maintained, and these, as there is evidence to show, have been operative for at least an indefinite period during the past, a study of these causes is to a certain extent a study of the manner in which the genesis of the world took place.

"Cosmogony, Cosmology. Words synonymous in meaning, applied to speculations respecting the first origin or mode of creation of the earth. . . .—Lyell: Princp. of Geol.; Glossary.

cōs-mōm'-ēt-rū, s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and μέτρον (metron) = a measure.] The science which measures the world. But as the world in the sense of the universe is limitless, and therefore unmeasurable, it must be the earth, the solar system, or the known parts of the universe which alone can be measured or estimated.

cōs-mō-plās'-tic, *cōs-mō-plās'-tick, a. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and Eng. plastic.] Pertaining to a plastic, spermatie, or formative principle alleged to be operative in the universe; or holding the metaphysical or cosmological tenet that such a principle was at work.

"The opinion of Seneca signifies little in this case, he being no better than a cosmopolitick atheist, i. e. he made a certain plastic or spermatick nature, devoid of all animality or conscious intellectuality, to be the highest principle in the universe.—Bailyn-well: Metaphr. (1811), p. 64.

cōs-mō-pōl'-i-tan, a. & s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world; πολίτης (polítēs) = a citizen; and Eng. suff. -an.] [COSMOPOLITE.]

A. As adjective: 1. Feeling at home in any part of the world; free from any national prejudices; pertaining to or resembling a cosmopolite.

2. Common to all the world; not restricted to any particular country or race; universally spread.

"The Chiroptera are cosmopolitan.—Prof. Owen.

B. As substantive: 1. A cosmopolite; one who is at home in any part of the world. 2. A worldling; one who cares for no country but only for himself.

cōs-mō-pōl'-i-tan-ism, s. [Eng. cosmopolitan; -ism.] The quality of being cosmopolitan; cosmopolitism.

" . . . some Englishmen, not wholly given over to that vice of cosmopolitanism. . . .—Times, Nov. 16, 1877.

*cōs-mōp'-ōl-ite (Eng.), *cōs-mō-pō-litēs (Gr.), s. [Gr. κοσμοπολίτης (kosmopolítēs) = a citizen of the world; κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and πολίτης (polítēs) = a citizen.] A citizen of the world; one who is cosmopolitan in feelings and character, being free from any national prejudices; one who is at home in any part of the world.

"I came tumbling out into the world a pure cadet, a true cosmopolite; not born to land, lease, house or office.—Boswell: Letters, bk. L., § 4, lett. 60.

*cōs-mō-pō-lit'-ic-al, a. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and Eng. political (q.v.).] Pertaining to or of the nature of a cosmopolite; cosmopolitan.

" . . . to meditate of the cosmopolitical government thereof.—Hackluyt: Voyages, l. 6.

†cōs-mōp'-ō-lit-ism, s. [Eng. cosmopolit(e); -ism.] The quality of being a cosmopolite; the character of a cosmopolite; the state or condition of a citizen of the world; cosmopolitanism.

"Indulgent to human nature in general, and loving it, but not with German cosmopolitanism.—Miss Edgeworth: Patronage, ch. xiv. (Davies.)

cōs-mō-ra'-ma, s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = the world, and ὄραμα (horama) = that which is seen, a view; ὁράω (horáō) = seen.] A series or collection of views of various parts of the world, laid horizontally upon a semi-circular table, and reflected by diagonal mirrors to the lenses at which the eye of the spectator is successively applied. The pictures are illuminated by hidden lamps.

"The temples and saloons, and cosmorama . . .—Dickens: Sketches by Bos; Vauxhall.

cōs-mō-rām'-ic, a. [Eng., Mod. Gr., &c. cosmorama(a), and Eng. suff. -ic.] Pertaining or relating to a cosmorama (q.v.).

cōs'-mōs, s. [Gr. = (1) order, (2) an ornament, (3) a ruler, (4) the world or universe from its perfect order and arrangement, as opposed to chaos. Probably from κομῶ (komō) = to take care of, to attend to.]

1. Ancient Phil.: The term κόσμος (kosmos) in the fourth sense [Etyrn.] appears first in the philosophy of Pythagoras. His followers Philolaos, Callierstidas, and others adopted the word, as did the philosophic poets Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Empedocles. From them it passed to the natural philosophers, with whom it became a current word. The Stoics used it for the anima mundi or soul of the world. With regard to extent it had several senses: (1) the earth, (2) the firmament, (3) the region in which the stars are fixed or apparently move; in the Alexandrian Greek, the known world. (Liddell & Scott.)

2. Modern Science: The universe, or as much of it as may be known by man. It is a sublime word, and useful when one competent for the task—if any man really is competent—attempts to sum up what is known, not of the earth merely, but of the solar system and the limitless expanse in which are the fixed stars. Thus a celebrated book in which the great naturalist Alexander von Humboldt in his old age massed together his stores of knowledge of nature, was called "Humboldt's Cosmos."

cōs'-mō-sphère, s. [Gr. κόσμος (kosmos) = . . . the world, and σφαῖρα (sphaíra) = a ball.]

Astronomical Instrument: An instrument for representing, though of necessity very imperfectly, the relative position of this earth with regard to the stellar "firmament." For the earth stands a terrestrial globe, for the stellar "vault" a hollow glass sphere, within which the before-mentioned globe is placed. But the firmament or vault is an infinite expanse between which and the diminutive earth there is absolute incommensurability.

cōs-sō-nūs, s. [From Lat. cossus (q.v.). Cf. Fr. cosson; Sp. gusano = a worm.]

Entom.: A genus of beetles, family Curculionidae or Weevils. They have short somewhat thick elytra, with a large ovsl club, a rather long rostrum, thickened at the apex, and elongate elytra. Sharp enumerates only one British species, Cossus linearis. It is about a quarter of an inch long, and is black or brown in colour, with punctate striate elytra. It is found in Bolet and trees. At least sixteen foreign species are known.

cōs'-sūs, s. [Lat. = a kind of larva, found under the bark of trees, supposed by some to be that of the stag-beetle, Lucanus cervus. This is not the modern genus Cossus.]

Entom.: A genus of Nocturnal Lepidoptera, family Hepialidae or Ghost-moths. They have long slender half serrate antennæ, a small head, and the upper wings longer than the lower ones. The larvæ feed on wood, the pupa is enclosed in a cocoon. Cossus ligniperda is the Goat-moth, so called because its larvæ emit a disagreeable smell, as the goat does. It is a large moth, the expansion of its wings being about 3 in. to 3½ in.; the upper pair grey mottled with white, and having moreover black bands; the lower ones brownish ash; the body brownish grey, with silvery lines. The ground colour of the larva is yellow; it is pink above, with the head and the first segment of the body black. It takes three years to come to maturity. It feeds on old pollard willow-trees, as well as on the poplar, the oak, and the aspen.

2. Scots Law: Duty payable in kind, as distinguished from that paid in money.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between cost, expense, price, and charge: "The cost is what a thing costs or occasions to be laid out; the expense is that which is actually laid out; the price is that which a thing may fetch or cause to be laid out; the charge is that which is required to be laid out. As a cost commonly comprehends an expense, the terms are on various occasions used indifferently for each other: we speak of counting the cost or counting the expense of doing anything; at a great cost or at a great expense; on the other hand, of venturing to do a thing to one's cost, of growing wise at other people's expense. The cost and the price have respect to the thing and its supposed value: the expense and the charge depend on the option of the persons. The cost of a thing must precede the price, and the expense must succeed the charge: we can never set a price on anything until we have ascertained what it has cost us; nor can we know or defray the expense until the charge be made. There may, however, frequently be a price where there is no cost, and vice versa; there may also be an expense where there is no charge; but there cannot be a charge without an expense. Costs in a suit often exceed in value and amount the thing contended for: the price of things depends on their relative value in the eyes of others: what costs nothing sometimes fetches a high price; and other things cannot obtain a price equal to the first cost. Expenses vary with modes of living and men's desires; whoever wants much, or wants that which is not easily obtained, will have many expenses to defray; when the charges are exorbitant the expenses must necessarily bear a proportion: Between the epithets costly and expensive there is the same distinction. Whatever is costly is naturally expensive but not vice versa." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) cost-book, s. & n.

Machinery:
1. A key; a wedge-shaped piece driven between the gibs in attaching a strap-head to a connecting-rod and tightening the brasses of a bearing. [Kev.]

2. A key inserted into a link which has been passed through another link of a chain. A broken chain is thus temporarily mended. This mode is adopted in fastening a log on the sled, and generally in securing an object by a chain when the whole length of the latter is not required. The hook at the end of the chain usually forms the cotter, and it is much better than making a running noose of the chain in the link, as the latter is difficult to unfasten, while the cotter can be slipped or driven out, leaving all free. A toggle.

3. A wedge which is driven alongside the end of the tongue in the mortise of the sled-roller, tightening the latter against the gib. [Gib.] (Knicht.)

Spain, whence in the fourteenth century it spread to Italy, and ultimately to the whole of Europe. It is mentioned as one of the "commodities" imported into England by the Janneys (Genoese) in the "Libel of English Pollicie" (1436), and even earlier in a "Comptus of Bolton Abbey," dated 1290, there is an item, "Sapo et cotoun ad candelam, xvij. s. ld." Cotton stuffs were first made by machinery by Louis Paul, between A.D. 1736 and 1740. They now constitute one of the leading staples of manufacture, alike in the large manufacturing cities of the United States and of England.

Columbus found the cotton-plant wild in Hispaniola, in other West India Islands, and in South America. The Mexicans were soon after found to be clothed chiefly in cotton. Cotton-seed was brought into England from the Levant, thence it was taken to the Bahama Islands, and in 1786 to Georgia. The first cotton-mill in America was erected at Beverly, Massachusetts, in 1788. The raw cotton required for the necessities of manufacture is raised in the Southern States, and converted into textile fabrics in the Northern and Southern States. The principal supply of Europe also comes from this country.

The production of cotton in the United States is over 7,000,000 bales annually; in the East Indies, 2,500,000 bales; China, 1,500,000 bales, &c. The consumption in the United States is about 3,000,000 bales; in Great Britain about 4,000,000, &c. Oil is produced from the seed.

B. As adj.: Made of cotton.

¶ Obvious compounds: Cotton-goods, cotton-manufacture, cotton-manufacturer.

cotton-bale, s. A bale of cotton.

¶ Cotton-bale tie: A device for fastening the ends of the hoops by which cotton-bales are kept in a compact state.

cotton-brush chopper, s. A machine with revolving knives to cut up the old dried cotton-stalks, to prepare the land for ploughing for another crop. (Knicht.)

cotton-chopper, s. An implement which is drawn over a drilled row of cotton-plants, and chops gaps in the row so as to leave the plants in bunches or hills. The machine is supported on two wheels, and has a plough to run on each side of the row. Motion is communicated from the rotary axle by bevel-wheels to a revolving head having oblique cutters, which chop gaps in the row of plants as the machine progresses. (Knicht.)

cotton-cleaner, s. A machine for separating the dust and dirt from cotton. This is performed by a scutching and blowing action, the tussocks of cotton being torn asunder and opened, allowing the dirt to fall out. The heavier portions fall through gratings, and the lighter are carried off through air-ducts by means of exhaust-fans. (Knicht.)

cotton-elevator, s. An arrangement in a cotton-mill of a tube with air-blast or spiked straps for carrying cotton to the upper stories.

cotton-famine, s.

Hist., &c.: The name given to the failure of the cotton supply to the Lancashire and other cotton-mills which took place whilst the ports of the Southern States of America were blockaded by the fleets of the North during the war between the Federals and Confederates, which continued from early in 1861 to 1865. When that great struggle began, nearly all the raw cotton required for manufacturing purposes had been supplied by America; when importation from that quarter failed, a stimulus was given to the cultivation of the cotton-plant in India and other countries. In India much cotton had from time immemorial been grown in Berar, a portion of the Nizam's dominions pledged to the Anglo-Indian government in security for a debt. One remote result of the famine has been to break the partial monopoly of cotton previously possessed by America, and increase at once the amount and the certainty of the supply.

cotton-gin, s. A device, originally invented by Whitney, 1794, in which lint is picked from the seed by means of saw-teeth projecting through slits in the side of the chamber in which the seed-cotton is placed.

cotton-grass, s. A name given to the species of the genus Eriophorum, because of their fruit being clothed at the base with a silky or cotton-like substance. It really belongs, not to the grasses, but to the sedges (Cyperaceae). There are several British species; the most common is Eriophorum angustifolium, the Narrow-leaved Cotton-grass, which is common in turfbogs and moors. Paper and the wicks of candles have been made of its cotton, and pillows stuffed with the same material. The leaves were formerly used in diarrhoea, and the spongy pith of the stem for the removal of tape-worm.

COTTON-GRASS.

cotton-hook, s. A claw with a handle, by which cotton-bales are moved in loading and shipping. (Knicht.) cotton-lord, s. A very rich cotton-manufacturer.

cotton-machines, s. pl. Machines of various kinds for carrying out the several processes in the cleaning, arranging, and weaving of cotton. [COTTON-CLEANER, COTTON-GIN, &c.]

cotton-mill, s. A factory or establishment for the manufacture of cotton-goods.

cotton-paper, s. We are indebted for cotton paper to the Arabians, and it is surmised that they learned it of nations still east of them. The use of cotton for this purpose was probably derived from China. Its first use in Europe was among the Sarscens in Spain, and cannot be traced back beyond the tenth century. It preceded the use of flax fibre for that purpose. The paper of Xativa, a city of Valencia, was famous in the twelfth century. (Knicht.) [PAPER.]

cotton-picker, s.

1. A machine for scutching cotton to tear apart the matted masses and clean it. [COTTON-CLEANER.]

2. A machine for picking cotton from the bolls of the plant. One form consists of a travelling toothed belt, which catches the cotton fibre and drags it into a receptacle. (Knicht.)

cotton-plant, s. The name given to various species of Gossypium, a genus of the order Malvaceae. It has the calyx cup-shaped, with five short teeth, the whole surrounded by an involucre cordate at the base, and above separating into three broad deeply-cut segments. The petals are 5; the atamena, which are many, are monadelphous; the ovary, 3-5-celled; the fruit, a 3-5-celled capsule; the seeds numerous, covered with cotton (q.v.). The genus has representatives in both hemispheres. How many species exist is difficult to determine. They have been unduly multiplied in books. Some one or other is cultivated everywhere, from the equator to 36° N., and the same of S. latitude. In the United States the species cultivated is Gossypium barbadense. There are two well-marked varieties: (1) The Sea-island, or Long Staple Cotton, introduced from the Bahamas in 1785, grown on the coast of Georgia and South Carolina, and on the adjacent islands; and (2) the Upland, Georgian, Bowed, or Short Staple Cotton, which grows in the Southern States generally. The former is the finer; the latter constitutes the bulk of the American cotton. Indian cotton is furnished by G. herbaceum. It grows in Persia, the Levant, Egypt, the south of Europe, &c. It is called Surats, from Surat, on the west coast of India, whence much of it is exported. The cotton of Brazil, Peru, and other parts of South America is derived from G. peruvianum. Cotton from the last two species is short staple.

cotton-press, s. A press in which cotton is baled for transportation and storage. There are various forms of cotton-presses, known as the screw, toggle, beater, revolving, hydraulic, portable, double-acting, windlass, rack-and-pinion, re-pressing, and rolling-pressure presses. See under those heads respectively. The old form of press was the screw, which ascended vertically from the follower and worked in a nut in the upper cross-beam. It was rotated by a sweep. (Knicht.)

cotton-printing, s. The art of staining woven fabrics of cotton with various figures and colours. (Weale.)

cotton-rose, s. A common name for the composite genus Filago.

cotton-rush, s. Eriophorum. [COTTON-GRASS.]

cotton-sedge, s. The same as COTTON-RUSH (q.v.). (Bentham.)

cotton-seed, s. The seed of the cotton-plant.

¶ (1) Cotton-seed cleaner: A machine for tearing the remaining fibre from the cotton-seed, or one which so far compacts the fibre upon the seed that the latter will roll upon itself without making a mat, and so become fitted to be sown by an ordinary machine. (Knicht.)

(2) Cotton-seed huller: A machine by which the hull of the cotton-seed is rasped off and sifted from the farinaceous and oily matters, which are utilized for their oil and the refuse for manure. (Knicht.)

(3) Cotton-seed mill: A mill for grinding the seed of cotton, either for manure or for obtaining from the meal the oil, either by pressure or the more usual mode of treatment by bisulphide of carbon (Sim's process) or hydrocarbon. (Knicht.)

(4) Cotton-seed oil: The oil expressed from the seed of the cotton plant. (Weale.)

(5) Cotton-seed planter: A planter in which the seed-plantations are positive, as the seed adheres by the interlacing of its fibres, and requires to be torn apart and driven down the chute to the ground. (Knicht.)

cotton-spinning, a. Engaged in spinning cotton. (Used of machines or of persons.)

"'Go, 'shill'd the cotton-spinning chorus; 'him I choked." Temnyson; Edwin Morris.

bell, boy; pout, fowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün. -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl.

cotton-thistle, s.

Bot.: The usual book-name given to Onopordum, a genus of composite plants with 4-ribbed glabrous achenes; plose, rough, sessile pappi; a honeycombed receptacle; a tumid involucre with spreading apiculate acales, and anthers cadate at the base with anbulate appendages at the apex. The Common Cotton-thistle is Onopordum Acanthium. It is a tall plant, four to six feet high, with very spinous wings, a globose involucre, and purple flowers. It is found in England and less frequently in Scotland, in waste ground, on roadsides, &c. It is sometimes cultivated in Scotland as the Scotch Thistle.

cotton thread, s. Cotton thread for sewing is made by laying together two or more yarns of equal quality and twisting them. Previous to the doubling and twisting, the yarn is passed through a trough containing a thin solution of starch. The twist is given in an opposite direction to that applied by the spinning-machine, as in the case of organzine silk. (Knight.)

cotton-topper, s. A machine which passes along and prunes the row of growing cotton-plants, in order to curb their rampant luxuriance. (Knight.)

cotton-tree, s.

1. The name given to a Sterculiad, Bombax pentandrum, growing in India. The bark is said to be emetic, and the gum, mixed with spices, is given in certain stages of bowel complaints.

2. (Pl.): The order Bombacæ (q. v.).

cotton-waste, s. Coarse or refuse cotton, used largely in cleaning machinery, &c.

cotton-weed, s. A name given to Oxypetalum and some other allied genera of composite plants. (Gerard.)

cotton-wood, s. An American name for two species of Poplar, Populus montifera and P. angulata.

cotton-wool, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

Comm.: Cotton consists of the hairs of the seed of various species of Gossypium. It can be distinguished under the microscope by appearing, when dry, as a flat band with thickened borders, while fiber cells, as linen, remain cylindrical, and taper to a point at each end. (Griffith & Henfrey.) Cotton-wool is used for making gun-cotton.

"If this be so, then disease can be warded off by carefully prepared filters of cotton-wool."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (2nd ed.), xi. 234.

B. As adj.: Made or consisting of raw cotton.

"If a physician wishes to hold back from the lungs of his patient, or from his own, the germs or virus by which contagious disease is propagated, he will employ a cotton-wool respirator."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), xi. 334.

cot-ton (1), (pron. cōtn), v. i. [COTTON, s.] To rise with a nap.

"It cottons well: It cannot choose but bear A pretty nap." Family of Love.

cot-ton (2) (pron. cōtn), * cotten, v. i. [Wel. cyfuno = to agree, to consent. (Skeat.)] To enter into a state of close intimacy, to unite or associate closely with; to agree, to coincide.

"That first with midst, and midst with laste Maye cotten and agree." Drant: Horace (1567), sig. A. v. back.

cot-ton-āde (cotton as cōtn), s. [Eng. cotton; -ade.]

Fabric: A stout thick fabric made of cotton; cotton check.

* cot-ton-ar-ŷ (cotton as cōtn), a. [Eng. cotton; -ary.] Pertaining to or made of cotton.

"Cottonary and woolly pillows."—Brown: Vulgar Errors.

cot-ton-ēe (cotton as cōtn), s. [A dimin. from cotton (q. v.).]

Fabric: A Turkish fabric of cotton and silk satinet.

* cot-ton-ize (cotton as cōtn), v. t. [Eng. cotton; -ize.] To cause to resemble cotton; to treat as cotton.

cot-ton-iz-īng (cotton as cōtn), pr. par. or a. [COTTONIZE.] cottonizing fibre, s. A process of disintegrating fibre, adopted with flax, hemp, jute, cane, &c., so as to reduce them to a short staple resembling cotton, which can be worked on cotton-machinery. (Knight.)

cot-ton-ōc-ra-gŷ (cotton as cōtn), s. [Formed from cotton (q. v.), on the analogy of aristocracy, &c.] The leading members of the cotton trade collectively.

* cot-ton-ōus (cotton as cōtn), a. [Eng. cotton; -ous.]

1. Downy or nappy; covered with a down or nap.

2. Soft as cotton.

cot-ton-ŷ (cotton as cōtn), a. [Eng. cotton; -y.]

I. Literally:

1. Having a nap or down resembling cotton.

2. Of the nature of or resembling cotton.

"Oaks bear also a knur full of a cottony matter."—Evelyn, l. 3.

II. Fig.: Soft as cotton, downy.

cōt-tōwn, cot-tar-town, s. [Eng. cottee; and town.] A village inhabited by cotters.

cōt-trēl, s. [COTTEREL.] A hook and trammel for suspending a cooking-vessel.

cōt-tūs, s. [Mod. Lat. cottus, from Gr. κόττος (kottos) = . . . a river fish, probably the Bull-head, Cottus gobio (see def.); from κόττη (kottē), korris (kottia) = the cerebellum.]

Ichthy.: A genus of fishes, by some made the type of a family Cottidae, by others placed under the Triglidae or Gurnards. The head is large, depressed, furnished with spines or tubercles; there are teeth in front of the vomer and in both jaws, none on the palatines; there are two dorsal fins; the anal fin is small; the body is without scales; the branchiostegous rays six. Cottus gobio the Bull-head or Miller's Thumb, abounds through the greater part of Europe and Northern Asia. It is seldom over 3 or 4 inches long. Its flesh is delicate, and reddish when boiled, like the salmon. C. scorpius, the Sea Scorpion or Father Lasher, is a common marine form, sometimes found in rivers.

cōt-u-lā, s. [Lat. cotula, cotyla; Gr. κοτύλη (kotulē)]

Bot.: A genus of composite plants, the type of the tribe Cotuleæ. None are English, but Cotula coronopifolia is found in Continental Europe.

cōt-ū-lē-sē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. cotulæ], and fem. pl. adj. suff. -ææ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of composite plants, tribe Senecionideæ.

cō-tūn-nite, s. [Named after Dr. Cotugno, of Naples.]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral of white colour or streak, of adamantine lustre, and a sp. gr. of 5.2, yet so soft that it may be scratched by the nail. It consists of chlorine 25.5, and lead 74.5. It is found in the crater of Mount Vesuvius, and in the lava which has flowed therefrom. (Dana.)

cō-tūr-nix, s. [Lat. = a quail.]

Ornith.: A genus of gallinaceous birds, family Perdixidæ (Partridges). It differs from the genus Perdix in not having a bare space behind the eye. Coturnix dactylisomus is the Common Quail. [QUAIL] It is a summer visitor to Britain.

† cō-tū-tōr, s. [Pref. co = con, and Eng. tutor (q. v.).] A joint tutor or guardian.

cōt-ŷ-lā, cōt-ŷ-lē, s. [Lat. cotyla, cotula; Gr. κοτύλη (kotulē) = anything hollow; a small vessel, a cup.]

1. Anat.: The cavity of one bone which receives the end of another so as to constitute an articulation.

2. Zool.: One of the auctorial cups or disks of the arms of a cuttle-fish, constituting a sucker by which the animal attaches itself to other objects, or other objects to itself.

cōt-ŷl-ē-dōn, s. [Lat. cotyledon; Gr. κοτυλήδων (kotulēdōn) = a cup-shaped hollow, a plect, probably Cotyledon umbilicus (l. 1): from κοτύλη (kotulē) = a cup.]

I. Botany:

1. A part of plants, order Crassulaceæ. Calyx, 5-partite; petals, united into a tubular or campanulate corolla; stamens ten, inserted in the tube of the corolla. Cotyledon umbilicus is a succulent plant with peltate, mostly radical leaves, and a simple raceme of pendulous cylindrical flowers of a yellowish-green colour. It is from six to twelve inches high, and is found in Britain on rocks, walls, and old buildings, especially in sub-alpine districts.

2. The first leaf, or one of the first two leaves, developed in a plant. In exogens two such leaves are present in the embryo of every plant, while in endogæa there is one. In exogens the two cotyledons are always opposite; in endogæa the second leaf developed is alternate with the first. On these distinctions or their absence have been founded three primary divisions of the Vegetable Kingdom.

COTYLEDON.

- 1. Pea.
- 2. Lime-tree.
- 3. Monocotyledon oat (section of seed).

viz., Dicotyledons, Monocotyledons, and Acotyledons. Sometimes, though rarely, there are more than two cotyledons; thus the Boraginaceæ and the Brassicaceæ have four, and the Conifera ten, twelve, or even fifteen; hence the term Polycotyledons has been used. In some cases they are absent; at other times they cohere instead of unfolding.

II. Anat.: One of the tufted patches of a ruminant placenta. (Huxley.)

† cōt-ŷl-ē-dōn-ā-l, a. [Eng. cotyledon; -al.] Bot.: Of, pertaining to, or resembling a cotyledon.

cōt-ŷl-ē-dōn-a-rŷ, a. [Eng. cotyledon; -ary.] Zool.: Having a cotyledon; tufted.

† cōt-ŷl-ē-dōn-ōus, a. [Lat., &c. cotyledon, and Eng. suff. -ous.] Compar. Anat.: A placenta in which the fetal villi are gathered into cotyledons or bunches as in ruminant mammals.

cōt-ŷl-ē-dōn-ōus, a. [Lat., &c. cotyledon, and Eng. suff. -ous.] Bot.: Pertaining to a cotyledon, possessing a cotyledon or cotyledons; as, Cotyledonous plants.

cōt-ŷl-ī-form, a. [Lat. cotyla, cotula; Gr. κοτύλη (kotulē)] [COTYLE.]

Bot. (Of a corolla): Hollow, resembling a cup or dish; rotate, but with an erect limb.

cōt-ŷl-ōid, a. & s. [Gr. κοτύλη (kotulē) = a cup, and είδος (eidos) = form.] Anat.: Cup-shaped.

"The acetabulum is a cotyloid or cup-shaped cavity."—Quain: Anat. (8th ed.), i. 108.

† (1) Cotyloid cavity of a joint: Anat.: A deeper joint-cavity, as distinguished from a glenoid or shallower one.

"... the glenoid and cotyloid cavities of the shoulder and hip joints."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. 1v., p. 95.

(2) Cotyloid ligament: Anat.: A thick fibro-cartilaginous ring round the margin of the acetabulum of the hip-joint. (Quain.)

cōt-ŷl-ōph-ō-rā, s. pl. [Gr. κοτύλη (kotulē) = anything hollow, a cup, &c., and φορος (phoros) = bearing, carrying.]

Compar. Anat. & Zool.: Mammals with cotyledonary placenta. This is found in the ruminant families Bovidæ (Oxen) and Cervidæ (Stags), while it does not exist in the Camelidæ (Camels) and the Tragulidæ (Chevrotains).

cōn-āg-gā, s. [QUAAGA.]

* couard, s. [COWARD.]

cōugh (1), * couchen, * cowchyn, v. t. & t. [O. Fr. colcher, coucher; Ital. corcare, from Lat.

colloc = to arrange, to set: col = con = with, together, and loco = to place; locus = a place.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Gen.: To arrange or set together in any place; to lay or dispose.

"Couchyn or leyne thinges togedyr. Colloc." - Prompt. Parv.

(2) Spec.: To lay or repose on a bed or couch.

"But where unrisued youth with unstuffed brain Doth couch his limbs, there golden sleep doth reign." - Shakesp.; Romeo, II. 4.

(3) To lay or deposit in a bed or layer; to bed.

"It is at this day in use at Gaza, to couch potsherds, or vessels of earth, in their walls, . . ." - Bacon: Nat. Hist.

(4) To conceal, to hide away.

"In the seller of Jupiter ther ben couched two tunnes." - Chaucer: Boethius, p. 34.

(5) To cause to cover or hide.

"This said, he shakes aloft his Roman blade, Which, like a falcon towering in the skies, Coucheth the fowl below with his wings shade." - Shakesp.; Terquins & Lucrece, 505-7.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To include, to comprise, to involve, to express.

"That great argument for a future state, which St. Paul hath couched in the words I have read to you." - Atterbury: Sermons.

(2) To conceal, to include or involve secretly.

"There is all this, and more, that lies naturally couched under this allegory." - L. Estrengue

(3) To arrange, to settle.

"The emperor's ban was already formally couched, and ready to pat to the print." - Reliquia Wottoniana, p. 321.

(4) To combine.

"Come then, my friend, I'll change my style, And couch instruction with a smile." - Colton: Death and the Rake.

(5) To set.

"His coat's armour was of a cloth of Fars, Couched of perlys whyte, round and grete." - Chaucer: C. T., 2, 162.

II. Technically:

1. Old War, &c.: To set or fix the spear in its rest.

"But he stooped his head, and couched his spear, And spurred his steed to full career." - Scott: The Lay of the Last Minstrel, III. 4.

2. Surg.: To practise an operation by which, when the crystalline lens of the eye has been rendered opaque by cataract, a needle is inserted through the coats of the eye, and the lens is pushed down to the lower part of the vitreous humour, so as no longer to stand in the axis of vision and impede the passage of the light.

3. Malting: To spread out steeped barley upon the floor to allow of its germinating, and so becoming malt.

"If the weather be warm, we immediately couch malt about a foot thick . . ." - Mortimer: Husbandry.

4. Paper-making: To take the flake of imperfectly compacted pulp from the mould or apron on which it has been formed. With hand-laid paper this is the business of the coucher, who receives the mould from the dipper and couches the sheet upon a felt. In paper-machinery the operation is performed by a roller called the couching-roller. (Knight.)

* B. Reflexively:

1. To lay or place one's self in as small a compass as possible.

" . . . the waters couch themselves, as a sphere as may be, to the centre of this globe, in a spherical convexity." - Burnet: Theory of the Earth.

2. To hide, to conceal.

3. To dispose to rest.

"There beneath thei couchen hem." - Maundeville, p. 63.

* C. Intransitive:

1. To lie down, especially upon a couch, the ground, &c.

" . . . others on the grass Couch'd, and now fill'd with pasture, gazing eat." - Milton: P. L., bk. iv.

2. To lie, to sleep.

"If I court mee women, you'll couch with mee men." - Shakesp.; Othello, IV. 4. (Sung.)

3. To crouch, to bend, to give way, to stoop.

"Isaacchar is a strong ass couching down between two hules." - Gen. xlix. 14.

4. To lie in concealment; to hide, to crouch.

"Where Bertram couched like hunted deer." - Scott: Rokeby, III. 4.

5. To be laid, disposed, or spread out.

" . . . Blessed of the Lord be his land, . . . for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath." - Deut. xxviii. 12.

† couch (2), v.t. [A contr. of couch-grass (q.v.)] To clear land of couch-grass, weeds, &c.

couch (1), * couche, * cowche, s. [O. Fr. colches, couche.] [Couch (1), v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A bed, or any place of rest.

"Who, when such good can be obtained would strive To reconcile his manhood to a couch." - Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

2. A bedroom, a bed-chamber.

"When thou shalt pryge, entre in to the couche, and the dore schot, pryge thi feir." - Wycliffe: Matt. vi. 6.

3. A sofa, a piece of furniture on which it is customary to repose or recline dressed.

4. The lair of a wild beast.

"Then myghte nyghte his couche kenne." - Avowing of K. Arthur, st. 12.

II. Technically:

1. Malting: The heap of steeped barley on the floor where the grains undergo germination, effecting the change into malt. The operation of couching takes about fourteen days, and the subsequent kiln-drying, which arrests germination, takes two days.

"The heap is called by malsters a couch, or bed, of raw malt." - Mortimer: Husbandry.

* 2. Naut.: [COACH, s., A. II. 2].

3. Painting, &c.:

(1) A layer or coat of paint or varnish on the canvas or panel intended to be painted on.

(2) A coat of gold or silver-leaf on any surface intended to be gilded or silvered over.

4. Arch.: A course or layer of sand. (Crabb.)

* couch-fellow, s. A bed-fellow; a very close and intimate companion.

couch (2), witch, twitch, quitch, quich, quick, s. & a. [Eng. quick = living, from the difficulty of eradicating.] The same as COUCH-GRASS (q.v.).

"Immediately after harvest couch lies near the surface." - J. Wrighton, in Cassell's Technical Educator, vol. II, p. 351.

couch-grass, witch-grass, twitch-grass, quitch-grass, quich-grass, s.

1. A grass, Triticum repens, sometimes called in books Creeping Wheat-grass. It has long apike, the spikelets with four to eight flowers;

1. COUCH-GRASS. 2. FLORET.

the glumes, which are awned or the reverse, having five to seven ribs. It is very common in fields and waste places. When occurring as a weed in cornfields, its long creeping root renders it difficult of extirpation.

"The couchgrass, for the first year, insensibly robs most plants in sandy grounds apt to graze." - Mortimer: Husbandry.

2. Holcus mollis.

3. Poa pratensis.

4. Avena elatior.

¶ (1) Black Couch: Alopecurus agrestis.

(2) White Couch-grass: Triticum repens. [COUCH-GRASS.]

couch-wheat, s. [Eng. couch, and wheat.] Triticum repens. [COUCH-GRASS.]

* couch-an-cy, s. [Fr. couchant, pr. par. of couch = to lie down.] The act or state of lying down; repose.

couch-ant, a. [Fr., pr. par. of coucher.]

* A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. Lying down in repose; reposing, squatting.

"Why thus the milk-white doe is found Couchant beside that lonely mound." - Wordsworth: White Doe of Rylstone, I.

2. Lying hid or in waiting.

"Then as a tiger who by chance has spied In some parlieu two gentle fawns at play, Straight crouches close, then rising, changes off His couchant watch, . . ." - Milton: P. L., bk. iv.

II. Fig.: Lying concealed; crouching, fearful.

"Oh then when plous conceals bore the sway! When couchant vice all pale and trembling lay!" - Dryden: Juvenal, sat. II.

B. Her.: Applied to animals represented as lying down, but having the head raised.

¶ Levant and couchant (lit., rising up and lying down): An epithet applied to animals which have been on the land of another long enough to lie down and rise up again; each time being held to include a day and a night at the least.

COUCHANT.

couch-é, a. [Fr.]

1. Her.: An epithet applied to anything lying along, as a chevron couché, a chevron lying sideways.

2. Carp.: A piece of timber laid flat under the foot of a prop or stay.

couchéd, * coucht, * cowched, pa. par. or a. [Couch, v.]

 [From Brazilian cuguaçu ará.]
Zool.: The name given in Brazil to the Puma, formerly called the American Lion, and now the American Panther. It extended formerly throughout a great part of both South and North America; but it has been destroyed through a great part of the latter, except its most westerly portions. It is the Felis concolor or the Puma concolor of naturalists. [PUMA.]

cough (pron kof), * coghe, *coughé, *cowe, *cowghé, s. & a. [Dut. kuch.] [Couch, v.]
A. As substantive:
 1. Med. & Ord. Lang.: A spasmodic effort, attended with noise, to expel from the air passages of the lungs some foreign body or irritating matter, which else would injure the delicate respiratory apparatus. Properly speaking it is not a disease; it is the effort of nature to remove what, if it be allowed to remain, may generate one; or it may be the symptoms of a disease of the lungs, the liver, the stomach, or the intestines; or may be produced by the over-excitability of the system in the nervous temperament. At the same time, when itself violent, it may produce morbid effects. Physiologically viewed a cough acts thus: some irritation produced by the passage through the air tubes of intensely cold air, or some other cause, affects their lining membrane, the capillary vessels of which become distended with blood. As these become thickened and tumified, the aperture for the passage of air is diminished and oppression ensues, the effect being greater if the venous rather than the arterial capillaries are the seat of the congestion. The secretion of mucus now exceeds what it would be in a state of perfect health, and the mucus itself becomes depraved in quality and is itself a fresh cause of obstruction. A cough comes to the relief of the patient. The violent expiration of air expels the matter causing the obstruction, and as the proper stimulus to the capillaries is that produced by arterial blood, this, which is always driven from the lung during expiration, removes the congestion in the capillaries, and at least temporarily relieves the system.
 2. Veterinary: Also called the husk; a disease incident to young bullocks when their windpipes are choked with tape-worms.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to cough; designed for use in cough, &c.

cough-wort, s. A plant, Tussilago Farfara. (Culpepper.)

Ornith.: The Puffin, Fratercula arctica, from the shape of its beak. [PUFFIN.]
cou-már-am-ine, s. [Eng. coumarin (in), and -amine.]
Chem.: C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>7</sub>(NH<sub>2</sub>)O<sub>2</sub>. An organic base prepared by the action of iron filings and acetic acid on nitro-coumarin. It crystallises in orangeneedles insoluble in ether, soluble in hot alcohol and in boiling water. It melts at 170°. It forms a crystalline salt with hydrochloric acid.
cou-már-íc, a. [COMAROUNA.] Pertaining to coumarin (q.v.).
coumaric acid, s.
Chem.: C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>7</sub>O<sub>3</sub> or C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>7</sub>(OH)CO—OH, also called oxy-cinnamic acid. Obtained by the action of potash on coumarin.

It crystallises in colourless plates, which melt at 190°. Its salts are mostly soluble in water.

cou-mar-íl-íc, a. [Eng. coumarin; il the same as yl (2) (q.v.), and ic.] Derived from coumarin.

coumarilic acid, s.
Chem.: C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>7</sub>O<sub>3</sub>. A monobasic acid obtained by boiling monobrom-coumarin with potash solution, and decomposing the potassium salt with hydrochloric acid. It crystallises from hot water in colourless needles, which are soluble in alcohol, melting at 195°.

Coumarin occurs in the Tonka-bean, the fruit of Coumarouna odorata, in small white crystals, between the seed-coating and the kernel; also in Woodruff, Asperula odorata, and in the leaves and flowers of Sweet-scented Vernal Grass, Anthoxanthum odoratum, and other plants. It has been prepared synthetically by heating salicylic sodium aldehydes with acetic anhydride, sodium acetate being produced at the same time. Coumarin is extracted from the Tonka-bean by strong alcohol; it crystallises in colourless rectangular plates, melting at 67°. It is nearly insoluble in water, has an aromatic odour and a burning taste, and is soluble in alcohol and ether. Bromine and chlorine unite with coumarin, forming C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>7</sub>O<sub>2</sub>Br<sub>2</sub> and C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>7</sub>O<sub>2</sub>Cl<sub>2</sub>, crystalline substances. Cold nitric acid converts coumarin into nitro-coumarin, C<sub>9</sub>H<sub>7</sub>(NO<sub>2</sub>)O<sub>2</sub>, but when heated converts it into picric acid. When boiled with strong caustic potash solution it is dissolved, and is reprecipitated by acids. Coumarin melted with solid caustic potash yields salicylate of potassium.

2. Cheese Manufacture: The coumarin existing in Melilotus czerulens imparts to Swiss Chapziger cheese its peculiar odour.

cou-mar-ou-ná, s. [From Coumarou, the name among the Indians of French Guiana; Fr. Coumaroun.]
Bot.: An old genus of Papilionaceous plants, now called Dipteryx (q.v.). [COUMARIN.]

Fr. concile; Ital. & Sp. concilio = a council, from Lat. conciliū = a meeting, an assembly; con = cum = with, together; calo = to call. The word is frequently found confounded with counsel (q.v.), with which it had originally no connection.]

A. Ordinary Language:
I. Literally:
 1. A number of persons met together for deliberation, consultation, and advice; especially a number of persons selected for their experience or eminence to act as advisers in the administration of any government, or of any branch of a government. [PRIVY COUNCIL, and see ¶ 7.]
 "An old lord of the council rated me the other day in the street about you, sir, ..."—Shakesp.: 1 Hen. IV., i. 2.
 2. The act of consulting and deliberating together; consultation, deliberation.
 "Then the Pharisees went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him."—Matth. xii. 14.
 3. The place where a council meets for deliberation and advice; a council-chamber.
II. Fig.: The faculty or qualifications necessary for counsel and deliberation; deliberative or consultative talent, judgment.
 "O great in action and in council wise!"
Pope: Homer's Iliad, bk. iv. l. 411.

B. Technically:
 1. Polit.: The higher branch of the legislature in some States of America and the English colonies; generally called a legislative council.
 2. Ch. Hist.: An ecclesiastical assembly, attended by the representatives of Churches scattered over a wide area—a province at least, but, in a large number of instances, the world—the subjects of the gathering being the discussion, and if possible the settlement, of questions then agitating the Churches. Church councils, to a certain extent, are modelled upon the gathering of the Apostles and Elders at Jerusalem to discuss the question what Jewish ceremonies, if any, should be imposed upon Gentile converts to Christianity (Acta xv. 1-29). This was essentially a council, but the technical view is that councils, properly called, did not arise till the second century. At first they were provincial, but in the fourth general or oecumenical councils began to be held. The word oecumenical was derived from Gr. οἰκουμένης (oikoumenikos), meaning of or from the whole world, and this again was from οἰκουμένη (oikoumenē), the inhabited world. During the time that the Church was developing itself into the form which it was destined to retain during mediæval times, seven oecumenical councils were held. The first met at Nicea in A. D. 325. It condemned Arianism, and gave its sanction to the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, which is still the creed of the Roman Catholic, of the Greek, and of the Protestant Churches. The second—that of Constantinople, A. D. 381—condemned the elder Apollinaris, or Apollinarius, and his followers, who believed that the Divine nature, in Christ, did the office of a rational human soul, and that God the Word, a sensitive soul, and a body, constituted his person. The third—that of Ephesus, A. N. 431—condemned Nestorius, who was alleged to have made Christ consist of two persons, whilst the council held that the Divine Saviour had two natures in one person. The fourth—that of Chalcedon, A. D. 451—condemned Eutyches, who maintained that there was only one nature in Christ, that of the Word, which became incarnate. The decisions of these first four councils are still accepted by nearly the whole of Christendom. Those of the fifth (the second at Constantinople, held in 553), the sixth (also at the same place, A. D. 680), and the seventh (that at Trullo, A. D. 691) have met with only partial acceptance.

The most important council of modern times, that held at Trent from A. D. 1545 to 1563, was not oecumenical, for its authority was not accepted by the Greek Church or by the Protestant reformers. It was, however, highly important, defining with precision the doctrines held by the Roman Catholic Church on all important points, and especially on those attacked by the Protestants.

A more recent council was that held at Rome in 1869 and 1870, which promulgated the infallibility of the Pope as head of the Church. Among Protestant councils may be mentioned the Pan-Anglican Synod, which met at Lambeth Palace in 1867, and was attended by Anglican bishops from England, from the Colonies, and from America. The Pan-Presbyterian Congress, which was held at Edinburgh in 1877, and a subsequent meeting in America were councils of the scattered Churches of that denomination.

"Thinks disputes that men clepeth the emperie of consulera."
Chaucer: Boethius, p. 64.
- † II. Fig.: Anything from which one derives counsel, advice, or instruction; a monitor, a guide.
"Thy testimonies also are my delight and my counsellors."
—Ps. cxix. 24.

count-sæl-lôr-ship, s. [Eng. counsellor; -ship.] The office or post of a counsellor.

"Of the great officers and officers of the kingdom, the most part are such as cannot well be severed from the counsellorship."
—Bacon: Advice to Villiers.

count-seyl-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [COUNSELLING.]

count, * countyn, n.f. & i. [O. Fr. compter, comter; Sp. & Port. comtar; Fr. comter, from Lat. computo = to reckon, to compute (q.v.).]

A. Transitive:
I. Literally:

1. To reckon up in numbers, to compute, to tell or number one by one.

"To a journey of forty miles Avaux counted only three miserable cabins."
—Macaulay: Dist. Eng., ch. xii.

2. To keep up or preserve a reckoning or account.
"Some people in America counted their years by the coming of certain birds amongst them . . ."
—Locke.

II. Figuratively:

1. To esteem, account, or reckon; to consider, to look upon in a certain light, character, or value.

"He counts hys a cow, that watz a kyng ryche."
—E. Eng. Allit. Poems; Cleanthes, 1, 685.

2. To ascribe or impute; to reckon or place to an account.
"And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness."
—Gen. xv. 6.

* 4. To take notice of, to pay attention or regard to.
" . . . I'll count his favours."
—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 2.

B. Intransitive:
I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To reckon or calculate in numbers.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To possess a certain value or carry a certain weight.

(2) To reckon, calculate, depend, or rely. (Followed by on or upon.)

"I think it a great error to count upon the genius of a nation, as a standing argument in all ages."
—Swift.

* (3) To take account or note. (Followed by of.)
" . . . no man counts of her beauty."
—Shakespeare: Two Gent. of Ver., II. 1.

II. Law: To plead or argue a case in court.

(1) To count out: An expression used in the British House of Commons when the Speaker, having had his attention called to the number of members present, counts them, and finding less than forty present in the House, declares the House adjourned.

(2) To count kin with one (Scottish): To compare one's pedigree with that of another.

† Crabb thus distinguishes between to calculate, to reckon, to compute, and to count:
" . . . to calculate is the generic term; the rest denote modes of calculating: to calculate denotes any numerical operation in general, but is particularly applicable to the abstract science of figures; the astronomer calculates the motions of the heavenly bodies; the mathematician makes algebraic calculations: to reckon is to enumerate and set down things in detail; reckoning is applicable to the ordinary business of life; tradesmen keep their accounts by reckoning . . . To compute is to come at the result by calculation . . . historians and chronologists compute the times of particular events by comparing them with those of other known events . . . To count is as much as to take account of, and when used as a mode of calculation it signifies the same as to reckon one by one; as to count one by one, to count the hours or minutes . . . These words are all employed in application to moral objects to denote the estimate which the word takes of things. To calculate is to look to future events and their probable consequences . . . to compute is to look to that which is past and what results from any past event . . . to reckon is either to look at that which is present and to set an estimate upon it, or to look to that which is future as something desirable . . . To count is to look on the thing that is present and to set a value upon it according to circumstances . . ."

—(Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

count (1), * counte (1), s. [O. Fr. conte, conte; Ital. conto, from Lat. computus.]

(2) Out of count, Out of all count: Incalculable, infinite.

count-wheel, s.

Hor.: A wheel with peripheral notches, whose intervals are spaces whose proportions are 1, 2, 3, up to 12. The wheel governs the striking so far as to regulate the number of blows. The knife-edge detent being lifted out of a notch, the hammer vibrates so long as the edge rests on the portion of the wheel between the notches. These spaces are graduated in length, so as to allow the hammer to make 1, 2, 3, &c., vibrations up to 12, when it has completed a revolution and begins again. Seventy-eight blows are struck in a complete revolution. It is superseded in some clocks by the rack and snail, invented by Tompion. (Knight.)

count (2), * counte (2), * countee (1), s. [O. Fr. conte, comte, from Lat. comes (genit. comitis) = a companion; so called because the person who received the appellation comes was chosen companion to his sovereign or chief. The term comes was borrowed from the later Roman empire.] A foreign title of rank, corresponding to the English earl.

"Princes and counties! Surely, a princely testimony, a goodly count-confect; a sweetgallant, surely!"
—Shakespeare: Much Ado, iv. 1.

count palatine, s.

1. Under the Merovingian kings the Count Palatine (Count of the Palace) was a high judicial officer with supreme authority over cases that came directly under the sovereign's cognizance. Later the title was given to powerful lords, who held over their provinces powers similar to those held by the original counts palatine. Such provinces were called palstrostes or counties palatine.

2. In England: The chief or head of a county. He exercised almost royal prerogatives within his own jurisdiction, held his own courts and appointed his own judges and officers. All writs and other legal processes could only be issued or enforced in his name. Three Counts Palatine existed in England: the Duke of Lancaster, the Earl of Chester, and the Bishop of Durham. The dignity of the first is now vested in the sovereign; that of the second in the Prince of Wales for the time being, and that of the third is now attached to the Crown. [COUNT, PALATINATE.]

* 3. German Empire: The name given to the rulers of two German or Bavarian states, known respectively as the Upper and Lower, or Rhenish, Palatinates.

* count-a-ble, a. [Eng. count, and -able.]

I. Literally:

1. Able or possible to be counted or reckoned.

2. Accountable.
"We are countable at the day of judgment."
—Sinners; Serm., II. 44.

II. Fig.: Not or worthy to be reckoned or considered; comparable.
"The evils which you desire to be recounted are very many, and almost countable, of those which were hidden in the basket of Pandora."
—Spenser: Ireland.

* counte (3), * countee (2), s. [COUNT.]

Spenser: F. Q., II. ii. 16.
 * 5. To act suitably to, or in keeping with, anything; to keep up an appearance of.
 "Malcolm! Banquo!
 As from your graves rise up, and walk like sprites,
 To countenance this horror!"
Shakesp.: Macbeth, II. 2.
 * 6. To grace, to honour.
 "... you must meet my master to countenance my mistress."
Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, IV. 1.
 ¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to countenance, to sanction, and to support: "Persons are countenanced; things are sanctioned; persons or things are supported: persons are countenanced in their proceedings by the apparent approbation of others; measures are sanctioned by the consent or approbation of others; measures or persons are supported by every means which may forward the object. There is most of encouragement in countenance; it consists of some outward demonstration of regard or good will towards the person: there is most of authority in sanctioning; it is the lending of a name, an authority, or an influence, in order to strengthen and confirm the thing: there is most of assistance and co-operation in support; it is the employment of means to an end. Superiors only can countenance or sanction; persons in all conditions may support: those who countenance evil does give a sanction to their evil deeds; those who support either an individual or a cause ought to be satisfied that they are entitled to support." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

B. Music: The term "counterpoint" in its broadest sense may be defined as "the art of adding one or more parts to a given melody;" in its more limited sense as, "the art of harmonising a theme by adding parts which shall be in themselves melodious." The terms subject, melody, canto fermo, and theme are synonymous. Counterpoint is simple or double. There are five species of simple counterpoint: (1) When the added part is a note against note of the subject; (2) when the added part is two notes to one of the subject; (3) when the added part is four notes to one of the subject; (4) when the added part is in syncope to each note of the subject; (5) when the added part is free, or has a florid accompaniment to each note of the subject. Counterpoints triple and quadruple, as their names show, are the due construction of three or four melodies respectively, in such a manner that they can be interchangeable without involving the infringement of the laws of musical grammar. (Stainer and Barrett.)

"The word occurs in several French phrases, which have become more or less adopted into our language.

(1) Coup d'état:

(a) Gen.: A decisive stroke or exercise of power to alter the constitution of a country by force, and without or against the consent of the people.

(b) Spec. (French Hist.): A revolution suddenly commenced and effected on December 2, 1851, by Prince Louis Napoleon, then President of the French Republic. Being of opinion that a plot against him was about to be attempted and would succeed unless he took the initiative, he dissolved the legislative assembly, established universal suffrage, and arranged that the election of a president for ten years should take place, and a senate be constituted. About 180 members of the dissolved assembly having attempted to meet were arrested, and on the two subsequent days sanguinary conflicts took place in the streets of Paris between the partisans of Napoleon and the more resolute upholders of the old arrangements. The former were victorious, and from the ten years' presidency to the empire his transition was easy.

1. Carp.: A couple.

"Even to the artificers and builders gave they it, to buy hewn stone, and timber for couplings, . . ."—Chron.: xxiv. 11.

2. Mach.: A device for uniting adjacent parts or objects. An arrangement by which the parts of a machine may be connected or disconnected at pleasure, or by which a machine may be disengaged from, or re-engaged with, a revolving wheel or shaft, through which it receives motion from a steam-engine, water-wheel, or other prime mover. (W'calc, &c.)

¶ There are innumerable varieties of couplings, such as chain-coupling, clutch, expansion-coupling, rod-coupling, shank-coupling, &c., which will be found described under their respective heads.

3. Music: A device by which the corresponding keys of different banks of keys are coupled together, so as to act together when one is played on; a couple.

4. Railway Engineering: One of the chains or rods which connect the several carriages of a train.

5. Mill-work: The connection of two or more shafts together, when it is necessary to convey motion further than would be possible by one shaft.

coupling-box, s.

Mach.: A metallic box into which the ends of the two shafts are fastened, to couple them in line. (Knight.) coupling-link, s.

Mach.: An open or split link for connecting two objects, or forming a detachable section in a chain. (Knight.) coupling-pole, s.

Vehic.: A pole connecting the fore and hind gear of a wagon. (Knight.) coupling-strap, s.

Vehic.: A strap connected to the off-bit-ring of the off horse, thence through the near bit-ring, and leading back to the harness of the near horse. Used with artillery horses, and also for restive horses in ordinary service.

côu'-pôn, * cou-pin, * cow-pon, s. [Fr., from couper = to cut.]

1. A fragment, a piece cut off, a bit.
"Gin I winna gie you a helpin' hean' mysel' tae rive him in a coupin' ith, him, an' spawl."—Saint Patrick, iii. 811.

2. A part to be detached, or cut out, from a ticket, paper, or the like.

3. Banking: A warrant or certificate for the periodical payment of interest on bonds issued for any term of years. The interest being payable in different cases quarterly, half-yearly, or yearly, as many coupons are attached to each bond as represent the total number of such payments as are to be made, with the date of payment printed on each. When a payment of interest becomes due at any particular date the holder of the bond detaches the corresponding coupon and presents it for payment at the specified banking-house or office.

4. Travelling: One of a series of tickets enabling the holder to perform a certain journey or tour, each coupon which represents a certain portion of the journey to be given up on completion of that portion.

côu-pûre', s. [Fr., from couper = to cut.]

Fort.: A passage cut through the glacier in the re-entering angle of the covered way, to facilitate sallies by the besieged. They are sometimes made through the lower curtain, to let boats into a little haven built in the re-entering angle of the counterescarp of the outworks. (Knight.) côur, v. [COWER.] To cower, to stoop, to bend down, to submit.

"But here my muse her wing mann' covr, Sic flights are far beyond her pow'r."
BURNS: Tam O' Shanter.

côur'-âge, * cor-age, s. [O. Fr. corage; Fr. courage; Ital. coraggio; Sp. coraje; Port.

coragem, from Lat. coraticum, from cor = the heart.]

* 1. The disposition of the mind; inclination.

"I'd such a courage to do him good."
Shakespeare: Timon, iii. 3.

* 2. A heartfelt desire, wish, or longing.

"Swiche a courage Hadde this knight to ben a wedded man."
Chaucer: C. T., 9, 130.

3. Bravery, boldness, daring, intrepidity.
". . . he was regarded by his party, and by the world in general, as a man of courage and honour."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

* 4. Encouragement.

"To the courage of such as would this realm any way evil."
State Trials (Sp. Gardiner), 1851.

¶ Now only used in the singular, but the plural was formerly not uncommon.

"So priketh hem nature in here courages."
Chaucer: C. T., 10.

¶ The courage of one's opinions: Fearlessness in expressing one's opinions on any subject, even when unpopular or unpalatable.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between courage, fortitude, and resolution: "Courage respects action, fortitude respects passion; a man has courage to meet danger, and fortitude to endure pain. Courage is that power of the mind which bears up against the evil that is in prospect; fortitude is that power which endures the pain that is felt: the man of courage goes with the same coolness to the mouth of the cannon, as the man of fortitude undergoes the amputation of a limb. Courage seems to be the attribute of a manly virtue; fortitude is more distinguishable as a feminine virtue: the former is at least most adapted to the male sex, who are called upon to act, and the latter to the females, who are obliged to endure; a man without courage would be as ill prepared to discharge his duty in his intercourse with the world, as a woman without fortitude would be to support herself under the complicated trials of body and mind with which she is liable to be assailed. Resolution is a minor species of courage; it is courage in the minor concerns of life; courage comprehends under it a spirit to advance; resolution simply marks the will not to recede. . . ; courage always supposes some danger to be encountered; resolution may be exerted in merely encountering opposition and difficulty. . . ." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between courage and bravery, see BRAVERY.

* côur'-âge, v. t. [COURAGE, s.] To encourage, to embolden or strengthen in spirit; to animate.

couronne-des-tasses, s. [Fr. = a circle or crown of cups.]

Galvanism: A kind of battery, the first improvement on the simple voltaic pile. A series of cups are arranged in a circle, very much as pearls or jewels might be around a crown. Each of these cups is filled with salt-water, dilute sulphuric acid, or other suitable liquid. Immersed in each are two plates, the one of copper or of silver, the other of zinc. The copper or silver of each of the cups is connected with the zinc of the next one. When a wire is led from the silver or copper of the last cup to the zinc of the first one, a voltaic current is formed, through which the electricity passes. The couronne des tasses was invented by Volta himself. It has long since been superseded by batteries of various kinds. [BATTERY, B. III. 4.]

cour-ou-cou, s. [An imitation of the plaintive cry of the birds so named.]

court-baron, a. The Court of a Manor. It is usually held by the steward, and is of two natures: the one, a customary court, appertaining entirely to the copyholders, in which their estates are transferred by surrender and admittance; the other, a court of common law, held before the tenants who owe service to the manor, the steward being rather the registrar than the judge. Its most important business was to determine, by writ of right, all controversies relating to the right of lands within the manor, but this writ having been abolished, its jurisdiction in this respect no longer exists. The court-baron may still hold plea of any personal actions where the debt or damage does not amount to forty shillings. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. III, ch. ii.)

court-breeding, s. The quality or condition of being bred or brought up at court.
 "Court-breeding, and his perpetual conversation with flatterers, was but a bad school."—Milton: Eikonoclastes.

 "He shall bece hym toward owe lord the kyng and his people, in the same office wele and covenably."
Indenture of 1469, Archæol., xv. 177.

2. Conveniently.
 "He soughte how he schulde hitraye him covenably."
Wycliffe: Mark xi. 11.

cōv-ën-ant, °covenande, °covenant, °covenant, °coveant, °covande, °covaunde, s. [O. Fr. covenant, covenant; Ital. covenente, from Lat. conventio = to come together.]

I. Ordinary Language:
 1. An agreement or compact on certain terms.
 "... but for that ouce couent
 To pray for you is ay so diligent."
Chaucer: C. T., 7, 857-8.

"Gather my saunts together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice."
Psalm l. 4.

2. A stipulation, a condition. [II. 1.]

"If we conclude a peace it shall be with such strict and severe covenants."
Shaksp.: 1 Henry VI., v. 4.

3. A writing or document containing the terms of an agreement or contract between two or more persons.
 "I shall but lend my diamond till your return: let these be covenants drawn between us."

II. Technically:

2. Scip., Theol., &c.: An engagement entered into between Jehovah and some other being or person.

(1) Scip.: A vast number of passages in the Old Testament, and a few in the New, speak of covenants. There was one with Noah, as the representative, after the Deluge, of all mankind existing or who should subsequently be born; nay, as the representative also of the inferior animated creatures (Gen. vi. 18, ix. 9-17). An "everlasting covenant" was made with Abraham and his posterity (xvii. 4, 7, 9), of which circumcision was the token (10-14). It was renewed to Isaac and his posterity (xvii. 19). The covenant was in force while the Israelites were a nation. The Sabbath was part of it (Exod. xxxi. 16). The two tables of stone on which the moral law was written were tables of it (Deut. ix. 11). The priesthood entered into it (Num. xxv. 13; Neh. xiii. 29). It was renewed to David (2 Sam. xxiii. 5). Private individuals, male and female, were bound by it—departing from God they violated his covenant (Psalm l. 26; Prov. ii. 17). That covenant the Israelites broke (Jer. xxxi. 32). These are the chief of the Old Testament covenants.

In the New, the Christian dispensation is considered as a covenant (Heb. viii. 13), the covenant of promise (Eph. ii. 12), of which Jesus is the mediator (Heb. xii. 24). There is reason to believe that for Testaments, in the expression Old and New Testaments, Covenanta should be substituted, and the heading of the two portions of Sacred Scripture should be The Old and New Covenants.

(2) Theol.: Two covenants are especially recognised by evangelical writers, the Covenant of works and the Covenant of grace (q.v.).

(3) Ch. Hist.: Cocceus, in the 17th century, carried the idea of Divine covenants more thoroughly than had before been done through his whole system of theology. Calvinists have done so to a greater extent than Arminians.

¶ (a) Covenant of grace or of redemption:

Theol.: A covenant of a twofold character; on the one hand, being between the Eternal Father and the Eternal Son, the former engaging, in consideration of the mission to earth and especially the atoning death of the Eternal Son, to grant salvation to those who should believe in the Redeemer. On the other hand, it was a covenant with men that, on their believing, they should receive eternal redemption through the blood of Christ.

(b) Covenant of redemption:
Theol.: [Covenant of grace.]

(c) Covenant of works:

Theol.: A Divine engagement formed with Adam, the parent of our race. Its condition was, Obey and live for ever; disobey and die (Gen. ii. 16, 17). It is believed that it was made for him as representing all who should ultimately spring from him, and that his fall made them no less than him liable to death.

3. Scottish, Ch., & Civil Hist.: Four bonds of agreement signed by those who believed that the religious views and the political settlement which they advocated were in danger of being crushed, and therefore pledged themselves to support them notwithstanding any peril which might arise.

(1) The first covenant was signed at Edinburgh on Dec. 3, 1557, by the Earls of Argyll, Glencairn, and Morton, Archibald Lord of Lorn, John Erskine of Dun, with many of the lesser barons and influential country gentlemen. [CONGREGATION.] It was designed to aid in carrying out the Protestant Reformation in the face of all resistance which might be offered to it by the Church of Rome.

(2) The second covenant was subscribed at Perth on May 31, 1559, by the Earls of Argyll and Glencairn, Lord James Stewart, the Lords Boyd and Ochiltree, and Matthew Campbell of Terringland. Its object was the same as that of the former one.

(3) The National Covenant was signed on Feb. 28, 1638, the first name appended being that of the aged Earl of Sutherland. The covenant was signed first in Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, and then as it lay spread out upon a tombstone in the adjacent graveyard. The people, the great majority of whom were Presbyterian, had by a vote and resolution rid themselves the year before of episcopacy, and knew that their only hope of ultimate success lay in union.

(4) The Solemn League and Covenant, written by the Rev. Alexander Henderson, accepted by the Scottish General Assembly on August 17, 1643, and subsequently by the Convention of Estates. It was then sent to London, where, on Sept. 25, it was subscribed by the English Parliament and the Westminster Assembly of Divines. It was designed to be a league between England and Scotland under the revolutionary leaders then dominant, and to establish in England no less than in Scotland the Presbyterian in lieu of the Episcopal Church.

This is the covenant most frequently alluded to by Sir Walter Scott in his novels. [COVENANTER.] When Scotland declared for Charles II. against Oliver Cromwell, the young king, previous to landing in 1650, subscribed the covenant. In 1661 the Scottish Parliament passed an Act absolving the lieges from the obligation, and prohibiting its renewal without their special warrant and approbation.

¶ Writ of Covenant:

Conveyancing: A writ which a person who was in process of purchasing land by means of a "fine" sued for as one step in the complex process. By this writ it was stated on tarry to the actual fact that the vendor had covenanted to sell the lands to the purchaser, and failed to keep his agreement, on which account the writ to compel him to do so was sought. When such an action was brought, the king, by ancient prerogative, claimed a noble for every five marks of land sued for, which came to one-tenth of the annual value. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 21.)

¶ The Writ of Covenant was abolished by 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 27, § 36. (Wharton.)

cōv-ĕn-ant, * cov-en-aunt, v.t. & i. [COVENANT, s.]

* A. Trans.: To grant or agree to by covenant.

"I shal recorde of my covenant of peas that Y covenantide with you."—Wyclife: Genesis ix. 15.

B. Intransitive:

1. To enter into a covenant, to bargain, to agree, to contract, to bind oneself by a covenant.

"Jupiter covenanted with him, that it should be hot or cold, wet or dry, calm or windy, as the tenant should direct."—L'Estrange.

2. To enter into an agreement on certain terms.

"And they covenanted with him for thirty peeces of silver."—Mat. xxvi. 15.

* covenant, * covenawnt, a. [O. Fr. covenant, covenant, pr. par. of covenier.] In agreement or accord.

"He semyth covenawnt and trewe."—Beno Florence, 344.

cōv-ĕn-ant-ĕd, pa. par. or a. [COVENANT, v.]

A. As *pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Secured by a covenant.

"And spread the sacred treasures of the breast Upon the lap of covenanted rest!"—Cooper: Conversation.

2. Bound by a covenant into which a person or a body has entered.

"Patronage had been abolished by a Covenanted Parliament in 1649, and restored by a Royalist Parliament in 1661."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

cōv-ĕn-ant-ĕs, s. [Eng. covenant; -es.] The party to a covenant or for whom the covenant is made.

"All covenants are dischargeable by the covenantees."—Hobbes: De Corpore Politico, pt. I, ch. ii.

cōv-ĕn-ant-ĕr, cōv-ĕn-ant-ōr, s. [Eng. covenant; -er, -or.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who enters into a covenant; a party to a covenant or contract.

"A covenant to do any action at a certain time or place is then dissolved by the covenantor."—Hobbes: De Corpore Politico, pt. I, ch. ii.

II. Ch. & Civil Hist.: A subscriber of or an adherent to any of the four covenants described under COVENANT, II. 2 (1), (2), (3), and (4), and especially the last two.

When the third or National Covenant was signed, it was pretty apparent that civil war would be the result of the deed, and preparations for it were made both by Charles I. and by the Covenanters. On Jan. 1, 1640, the latter took post upon Dunse Law to the number at first of 12,000, and after a little of 24,000. Next year they entered England, made a treaty with the English parliament, and aided them in the civil war against the king. On the fall of Charles they entered into the Solemn League and Covenant, designed to promote uniformity of belief both in England and Scotland on the basis of a Presbyterian establishment, but very partial success attended the scheme. Being monarchical rather than republican, they sympathized with Charles II. against the Commonwealth, and on his subscribing the covenant on August 16, 1660, fought an obstinate battle for him at Worcester on Sept. 3, 1651, which resulted in their defeat and a "crowning mercy" for their antagonist Oliver Cromwell. In 1661, when the English and Scotch nations concurred in restoring Charles II., that monarch renounced the covenant, his prior subscription to which had been insincere. Parliament declared the covenant illegal, and ordered it to be burnt. Many in consequence renounced it, or quietly allowed the fact that they had ever signed it to lapse in oblivion; but the more resolute spirits held to what they had done, and no severity on the part of the government could turn them aside from their purpose. Oftener than once they were in arms against the government. In November, 1666, they were dispersed with loss at Brillon Green in the Pentland Hills. On June 1, 1679, they defeated Claverhouse, the "Bonnie Dundee" of song, at Drumclog, but were themselves totally routed by the Earl of Monmouth at Bothwell Bridge on the 22nd of the same month and year; many of the prisoners taken being tortured and then subsequently executed. For a time the noted Richard Cameron was their leader, on which account they are often called Cameronians (q.v.). He, with about twenty others well armed, entered the little town of Saughar, in Dumfriesshire, on June 22, 1680, and formally proclaimed the deposition of "Charles Stuart," meaning the king, but he was killed in a skirmish at Airdross, in Ayrshire, on July 20. For their subsequent history see CAMERONIANS, also REFORMED PRESBYTERIANS.

cōv-ĕn-ant-ĭng, pr. par., a., & s. [COVENANT, v.]

A. As *pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As *adj.: Entering into a covenant or contract.

C. As *subst.: The act of entering into a covenant or contract.

1. A meeting, an assembling together.

"If ther shal entre into youre count, or gedaryng togidere, a man."—Wyclife: James ii. 2.

2. Society, company.

"Thou hast defendid me fro the cōwent of warleria."—Wyclife: Ps. xliii. 3.

3. A convent, a monastery.

"Their monasteries, cōwents, hospita, &c."—Bale: On the Revelation (1550), l. 6.

¶ The form still survives in Covenant-garden, formerly the garden of a convent or monastery.

Cōv-ĕn-trĭ, s. [A.S. cōfentreo, from Cōvent [COVE], the ancient name of a little river which runs past the town, and -ree or -ry = a river (Somner). According to others, a corruption of Convent-garden, from a spacious convent founded, according to Lelsind, by Cnut, and destroyed by Edric in 1016. In 1044 Earl Leofric, with his wife, the lady Godiva, founded at Coventry a magnificent Benedictine monastery (Charnock, etc.)] The name of a town in Warwickshire.

¶ To send any one to Coventry: A phrase signifying to refuse to have any communication or intercourse with any one, to take no notice of him, to exclude him from society. The origin of the phrase is not very clear. Several explanations have been given, of which the most plausible is that the citizens of Coventry had, at one time, so great a dislike to soldiers, that any woman seen speaking to one was at once shut out from society, no intercourse whatever being allowed between the garrison and the townspeople; hence any soldier sent to Coventry was shut out from all social intercourse.

Coventry bells, s. The bells or bell-shaped corollas of Campanula Medium, or that plant itself. It is called also CANTERBURY BELLS (q.v.).

Coventry blue, s. Blue thread, much used for working or embroidering upon linen. The preparation of it was formerly one of the staples of Coventry.

"I have lost my thimble and a skein of Coventry blue."—B. Jonson: Gipsies Metam.

Coventry rapes, s. [From Lat. rapum sylvestre.] The same as COVENTRY BELLS. (Lyte.)

cōv-ĕr (1), * coover, * covere (1), * covyr (1), * keoverie, * kever (1), * kevere (1), * kever (2), * kuvere (1), v.t. [O. Fr. covrir; Fr. couvrir; Ital. coprire; Sp. & Port. cubrir, from Lat. cōoperio: co = con = altogether, fully, and operio = to shut, to hide.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. To overspread, to overlie.

"... a cloud covered the mount."—Exod. xxiv. 15.

2. To overspread with anything.

"Go to thy fellows, bid them cover the table, serve to the meat, and we will come to dinner."—Shakspeare: Merch. of Venice, iii. 4.

3. To extend over.

"Drown'd in his own blood Goliath lay And cover'd half the plain."—Cowley: The Davideis, bk. ii.

4. To overspread with some intervening object so as to conceal from sight.

"In life's cool vale let my low scene be laid, Cover me, gods, with Tempe's thickest shade."—Cowley.

B. Military:

(1) To shelter or protect troops in their retreat.

(2) To stand exactly behind another man.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to cover and to hide: "To cover is to hide as the means to an end: we commonly hide by covering; but we may easily cover without hiding, as also hide without covering. The ruling idea in the word cover is that of throwing or putting something over a body: in the word hide is that of keeping carefully to one's self, from the observation of others. ... There are many things which decency as well as health require to be covered; and others which from their very nature must always be hidden. Houses must be covered with roofs, and bodies with clothing; the earth contains many treasures, which in all probability will always be hidden." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* cōv-ĕr (2), * covere (2), * covyr (2), * kever (2), * kevere (2), * kevyr (2), * kuvere (2), v.t. & i. [O. Fr. cobrier, coubrier; Port. & Sp. cobrar; Lat. recupero.]

3. An envelope.

II. Figuratively:

1. Anything which serves to conceal or screen.

"Sarsfield set forth, under cover of the night, with a strong body of horse and dragoon."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

2. A superficial covering or appearance; a pretence, a veil.

"The truth and reason of things may be artificially and effectually insinuated, under the cover either of a real fact or of a supposed one."—L'Estrange.

3. A shelter, a defence, either from an enemy or the weather.

" . . . his army was under cover, . . ."—Clarendon.

4. The articles necessary for the use of one person at table.

5. In the same sense as B. 1.

B. Technically:

1. Sport: A thicket, underwood, or brush, kept up for the preservation of game.

(3) A turret or cupola on a kitchen or boiling-house, pierced at the sides to let out steam or smoke.

4. Steam-engine: The lap of a slide-valve. [LAP.] (Knight.)

Crabb thus discriminates between cover, shelter, and screen: "Cover is literally applied to many particular things which are employed in covering; but in the general sense which makes it analogous to the other terms, it includes the idea of concealing: shelter comprehends that of protecting from some immediate or impending evil: screen includes that of warding off some trouble. A cover always supposes something which can extend over the whole surface of a body: a shelter or a screen may merely interpose to a sufficient extent to serve the intended purpose. Military operations are sometimes carried on under cover of the night: a bay is a convenient shelter for vessels against the violence of the winds: a chair may be used as a screen to prevent the violent action of the heat, or the external air. In the moral sense a fair reputation is sometimes made the cover for the commission of gross irregularities in secret. When a person feels himself unable to withstand the attacks of his enemies, he seeks a shelter under the sanctity and authority of a great name. Bad men sometimes use wealth and power as a screen from the punishment which is due to their offences." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

†cōv-ēt-ōūs-lý, adv. [Eng. covetous; -ly.] In a covetous manner; with an inordinately eager desire to obtain; avariciously.

cōv-ēt-ōūs-nēss, s. [Eng. covetous; -ness.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality of being covetous; an inordinate desire for money; avarice.

"They might have pardoned his covetousness . . ."
—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

2. An eager longing or desire for anything; eagerness.

"When workmen strive to do better than well,
They do confound their skill in covetousness."
Shakespeare: King John, iv. 2.

II. Theol.: The desire for what is not one's own, whether it be money, other property, or anything else of a desirable kind. In Mahraita, lobb (covetousness) is often used for lust or concupiscence rather than avarice, and in some Scripture passages (as Ephes. v. 5) the meaning seems to be the same.

† Crabb thus discriminates between covetousness, cupidity, and avarice: "All these terms are employed to express an illicit desire after objects of gratification; but covetousness is applied to property in general; cupidity and avarice only to money or possessions. A child may display its covetousness in regard to the playthings which fall in its way; a man shows his cupidity in regard to the gains that fall in his way; we should therefore be careful to check the covetous disposition in early life, lest it show itself in the more hateful character of cupidity in advanced years. Covetousness is the natural disposition for having or getting; cupidity is the acquired disposition. As the love of appropriation is an innate characteristic in man, that of accumulating or wanting to accumulate, which constitutes covetousness, will show itself, in some persons, among the first indications of character: where the prospect of amassing great wealth is set before a man, as in the case of a governor of a distant province, it will evince great virtue in him, if his cupidity be not excited. The covetous man seeks to add to what he has; the avaricious man only strives to retain what he has: the covetous man sacrifices others to indulge himself; the avaricious man will sometimes sacrifice himself to indulge others; for generosity, which is opposed to covetousness, is sometimes associated with avarice." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

cōv-ēt-ta, s. [See COVE (1), s.] A plane used for moulding framework, called also a quarter-round. (Knight.)

cōv-ēy (1), s. [O. Fr. covee; Fr. couvée, from O. Fr. cover; Fr. couver = to hatch, to brood; Lat. cubo = to lie down.]

I. Literally:

1. A hatch; an old bird with her young.
2. A small flock or number of birds feeding together.

1. Ord. Lang.: A trick, treachery, scheming, artifice. (Chaucer: C. T., 605.)

2. Law: An agreement or collusion between two or more persons to the prejudice or hurt of another.

cōv-in-tree, s. Scott, in a note to Quentin Durward, ch. liii., where the word occurs, says that the large tree in front of Scottish castles was sometimes so called. Davies suggests it may be from Lat. convenio, since it was at the covin-tree that the laird received guests, and thither he accompanied them on their departure.

cōv-īng, s. [COVE, v.]

1. The overhang of the upper portions of a building beyond the limits of the ground-plan.

2. The eplayed reveals or inclined jambs on the sides of a fireplace. These jambs were square in the old English fireplaces. In some of the Louvre fireplaces the jambs have an angle of about 45°. These were probably erected about 1750, by Gabriel, under the orders of M. de Maligny. Gauger had previously (1715) given to the coving a parabolic curve. Count Rumford invented or adopted the inclined coving, having an angle of 135° with the fire-back, to radiate heat into the room. (Knight.)

*cōv-in-ōūs, a. [Eng. covine; -ous.] Fraudulent, deceitful.

cōv (1), *cou, *cu, *ku (pl. *ky, *kie, *kys, *kine, *kuyr, *kin, covs), s. & a. [A.S. cu (pl. cy). Cogn. with Dut. ko; Icel. kyr; Sw. & Dan. ko; G. H. Ger. chuo, chuo; M. H. Ger. kuo, kw; Ger. kuh; G. Ir. & Gael. bó, all = a cow; Lat. bos; Gr. βovs (bous) = an ox.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 1, 2

† 2. Figuratively:

(1) A coward.

(2) A coarse, awkward woman.

II. Technically:

1. Zool.: The female of the bovine species called the Ox, Bos taurus, of which the bull is the male. Like other domestic animals it has run into numerous varieties, and its primitive uniformity has given rise to manifold diversity. Nor is it in colour alone that it has altered. It has done so in form, besides which there are horned and hornless oxen. The period of gestation of the cow is nine months, and the normal number of her offspring at a birth only one. [Bos, CATTLE.]

2. Farming, Dairy Operations, &c.: "A perfect cow," says an old writer, "should have black eyes, large clean horns, a long thin skin, a large deep belly, strong muscular thighs, round legs, broad feet, short joints, &c., white large udder with four teats." Speaking broadly this is correct; but in the choice of a cow attention should be given primarily to the nature of the pasture into which it is to be turned. The Darwinian principle of natural selection with the survival of the fittest has adapted cattle of different sizes and qualities to different parts of the country; little active Highland cattle thriving on the scanty herbage found high up the mountain-side, and large heavy going cattle of luxurious proclivities falling off unless they are allowed to revel amid the rank vegetation of river-sides and meadows. The latter furnish the greatest quantity of milk. To preserve them in health, plenty of fresh air, artificial food when natural supply runs short, shelter in winter and in bad weather, and forbearance to force medicine upon them when it is not needed, are the chief requisites. Apart from breeding purposes, cows are specially kept in this country to furnish milk. For details see that word.

3. Mining:

(1) A wooden wedge to jam against the barrel of a gin or crab, to keep it from revolving.

(2) A rude shed erected over the mouth of a coal-pit.

4. Mach.: A kind of self-acting brake formerly used on inclined planes; a trailer.

B. As adj.: Female, the term being used not merely for the female of the species described under A, but for that of any of the larger herbivorous mammalia. It is opposed to bull, adj., in the sense of male or masculine. [COW-CALF.]

*cow-babe, s. A coward.

cow-pox, s. [Eng. cow, and pox.]

Medical :
† 1. Gen. : Any disease producing pox upon the udder or other parts of a cow. Edward Jenner discovered that there were several of these.

2. Spec. : That particular cutaneous disease affecting the udder of the cow, which, being transferred to the human frame, either gives an immunity from small-pox or diminishes its violence. That this is its effect had long been a popular belief among the dairy milkers in Gloucestershire, and when, prior to 1770, Jenner was an apprentice to Mr. Ludlow, an eminent surgeon at Sudbury, near Bristol, a young woman who came into the shop where he was, to ask advice, hearing small-pox mentioned, said with decision, "I cannot take that disease, for I have had cowpox." Jenner mused upon the statement, and spoke of it to scientific men, who all treated it with ridicule. Continued investigation, however, satisfied him of its truth, and about 1780 he struck out the brilliant thought that it might be practicable to propagate cowpox as a preservative against small-pox, by inoculating some human being from the cow, and from that person transferring the matter to another and another of the community till protection was obtained for all. This was the origin of vaccination (q.v.).

"What varied wonders tempt us as they pass!

A. As substantive :

Bot. : A well-known plant, Primula veris, of the same genus as the Primrose, P. vulgaris, the Oxslip, P. elatior, &c. The two last are very much akin. The first and second widely differ in appearance, but statements from time to time appear that they have been found growing from the same root, in which case they would not be two species, but varieties of one. To naturalists believing in the separate creation and subsequent immutability in essential character of each species, this would be an important fact; but Darwinians would regard it as of little moment. They would probably derive the Primrose, Cowslip, Oxlip, &c., from a now extinct primulaceous plant more generalised than any of these. The Cowslip has ovate-crenate, toothed, and wrinkled leaves, with the flowers in an umbellate scape. It is common in clayey soils in England, but is rarer in Scotland. The flowers are sedative and diaphoretic. They make a pleasant soporific wine. In the United States the name Cowslip has been applied to a plant of different genus, the Dodecatheon Meadia, a handsome spring flower. It is sometimes called Shooting Star.

"The flowery May, who, from her green lap, throws
The yellow cowslip, and the pale primrose."

3. Hydraul. Engin.: The frame in which a ship lies on the ways, and which accompanies her in launching; or, the frame in which a vessel lies on a way or slip, or in a canal-lift. A cradle was used in very early times in crossing the Isthmus of Corinth, from the Corinthian to the Cenchrea Sea. The place was called the Diolcos, or drawing-place, and was five miles in length. This crossing-place was again used during the maritime warfare between the Genoese and the Turks. In its simple form, the cradle consists of three longitudinal timbers united by ribs or cross-pieces. This is floated beneath the ship, which is lashed thereto by cables. The cradle and its burden are then floated to the inclined ways or slip, up which it is hauled, being supported by rollers which intervene between the timbers of the cradle and those of the slip. (Knight.)

4. Metal.: A rooking apparatus, used in collecting gold from soil and sand by agitating the auriferous earth in water. The earth is shovelled into the sieve, and washed through its meshes by water, which also carries off the lighter earthy particles in suspension. The coarser matters, which do not pass the meshes of the sieve, are thrown out and the operation repeated. After a large quantity of earth has been thus disposed of, the contents of this cradle are washed in a pan and the gold obtained from the settlings. (Knight)

5. Engraving.: A tool used by mezzotint-engravers. It consists of a steel plate with a proper tang and handle, and has angular grooves on its under surface, so that when the rounded end is obliquely ground, it will form a row of points by which a multitude of burrs are raised upon a plate. This is the mode of proceeding in mezzotint-engraving (q.v.), the cradle being rocked backwards and forwards, and retreating, making a zigzag series of burrs. This is crossed at right angles, and then several times diagonally, until the whole surface of the plate is roughened, so as to hold the ink of the copper-plate printer. The burisher and scraper remove the burr in parts, according to the desired graduation of lights. (Knight.)

crag (4), s. [Provinc. Eng. crag, a term used in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex to designate masses of shelly sand used to fertilize soils deficient in calcareous matter. (Lyell.)

Geol.: Three series of British beds, all of Pleocene age; the uppermost, the Norwich Crag, being newer, and the Red Crag and White or Coralline Crag being older Pleocene. Of the latter age is a series of foreign beds called Antwerp Crag. The following series is in a descending order:

1. The Norwich, Fluvio-Marine, or Mammothiferous Crag: The first name is given because it is found chiefly in the neighbourhood of Norwich. It consists of incoherent sand, loam, and gravel, exposed on both sides of the Ysre. These must have been deposited originally in an estuary for the organic remains are partly land, partly fluviatile, and partly marine. Characteristic mammalian remains are the Mastodon arvernensis and the Elephas meridionalis. Of 124 marine shells, Mr. Searles Wood considers that 18 are extinct. Arctic shells are rarer than in the beds above.

2. The Red Crag of Suffolk and Essex, &c.: It is the highest of the older Pleocene strata. It rarely exceeds 20 ft. in thickness. Excluding 25 species of molluscs derived from other beds, there are, according to Mr. Searles Wood, 256 known species of shells in the Red Crag, of which 65 or 25 per cent. are extinct.

3. The White, Lower or Coralline Crag: It is limited in extent, ranging only about 20 in. in length by 3 in. or 4 in. in breadth, between the rivers Stour and Aids in Suffolk. It is calcareous in composition, often consisting of comminuted shells and remains of bryozoa. From the abundance of the latter it is called Coralline Crag, but this is somewhat of a misnomer, for bryozoa are not real corals. Mr. Searles Wood considers that 850 species of mollusca have been found in it, of which 110, or 31 per cent., seem to be extinct.

¶ Corresponding in age to 2 and 3 is the Antwerp Crag, found near the city after which it is called and along the Scheldt.

4. The Black Crag: The lowest part of the Antwerp Crag, more ancient than any of the British crag beds, and approaching the point of junction with the Upper Miocene. (Lyell.)

cragge, s. [CRAO (1), s.]

crán-bér-ry, †cráne-bér-ry, s. [Eng. crane, and berry.] Names of similar import are found in many European languages.

I. Singular:

1. (Of the form cranberry):

(1) A plant, Vaccinium Oxyccocos, having also the book-name of the Biahra Whortleberry.

It has a filiform stem, ovate evergreen leaves, glaucous beneath, their margin revolute and entire; a terminal stogia-flowered peduncle, a four-parted revolute corolla, and a berry of a bright roseate hue. It is found in peat bogs, especially those where sphagnum grows. The berries are often made in tarts, for which they are well adapted. The deeply-divided revolute segments of the corolla have led Richard and other botanists to separate the species from Vaccinium and call it Oxycoccus palustris.

(2) Vaccinium Vitis-idaea (north-east of Scotland).

(3) Arctostaphylos Uva-ursi (chiefly in Aberdeenshire).

2. (Of the form cranberry. Used in Sutherlandshire): The same as I. 1. (1).

¶ (1) American Cranberry: Vaccinium macrocarpum, or Oxycoccus macrocarpum, or macrocarpa. It is found through a great part of North America. The berries are exported to England.

(2) Tasmanian Cranberry: An epacrid (As-troloma humifusum). It has scarlet blossoms and a green, whitish, or slightly reddish fruit, about the size of a currant; this consists of a viscid, apple-flavoured pulp, enclosing a large seed.

1. Ornithology & Ordinary Language:

(1) Sing.: Any bird of the genus Grus, or the family Gruidae (q.v.). The Common Crane is Grus cinerea. The tip of the bill is horn-coloured, its middle part greenish-black, the base reddish. The top of the head, which is naked, is of a red colour; the plumage in general is an ashy gray; the throat, neck, and occiput darker; the feet black—length 3 feet 8 in. to 3 feet 10 in. It is a gallinular bird, frequenting marshes, but has certain affinities to the Rasores. It is a migratory bird, in winter living in India, Egypt, and other warm countries of the old world, and in summer migrating to the north. In these passages it flies generally by night, high in air, in a large wedge-formed flock, led by a single leader, or in long lines, and with discordant cries. These movements attracted the notice of the ancient classic writers. The crane was once common in the fenny parts of England, now it is rare. Where it breeds, which is in the north of Europe and Siberia, the nest is among rushes, or even on the walls of unfrequented houses. The eggs, two in number, are pale bluish-green, with brown markings. [GRUS, GRUIDÆ.]

"Like a crane, or a swallow, so did I chatter."—Ira, xxviii. 15.

(2) Pl.: The birds of the genus Grus, or the sub-family Gruidae, or the family Gruidae (q.v.).

1. Occipital, 2. Temporal, 3. Parietal, 4. Sphenoid, 5. Frontal, 6. Ethmoid.

with the sphenoid and the ethmoid bones. The principal part of the vault of the cranium is formed by the parietal bones, which rest upon the wings of the sphenoid and upon the temporal bones; these so overlap the lower parts of the parietal bones, as to prevent them starting out; in fact, they operate in the same way as the tie-beams in the roofs of houses.

"That substances and modes of every kind Are mere impressions on the passive mind; And he that splits his cranium, breaks at most A fancied head against a fancied post."

Cooper: Anti-Thelyphthora.

crānk, *cranok, *cranke, a. & s. [An original English root, of which other languages have only less distinct traces: the original form was krank = to bend, to twist. Cf. Dut. kronkel = a rumple, a wrinkle; kronkeln = to rumple, to wrinkle, to bend, to turn, to wind. (Skeat)] [CRANK, a.]

A. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit. (Of a material body, as a planet, &c.):

- 1. A turn, winding, or revolution.
- "So likewise grin Sir Saturne oft doth spare His stern aspect, and calms his crabbed looks. So many turning cranks these have, so many crookes."—Spenser: F. Q., VII. vii. 62.

2. In the same senses as B.

B. Figuratively:

- 1. Any turn, revolution, or vicissitude.
- 2. Any conceit formed by twisting or changing in any manner the form or meaning of a word; a pun.
- 3. (U. S.) A person whose mental faculties have been wroglly twisted or bent in one particular respect or particular respects; a mild monomaniac; hence any eccentric individual.

B. Technically:

1. Machinery:

(1) An arm (called the web) at right angles to an axis, by which motion is imparted thereto or received therefrom. The crank on the axis of a grindstone or a fanning-mill is a familiar instance. The crank is also a valued device in converting a rotary into a reciprocating motion, or conversely. An example of the former is found in the saw-mill; of the latter, in the steam-engine. Watt is the inventor of the latter application of it. The crank was first used in connection with steam-navigation by William Symington, in 1802, on his second steam-boat, the "Charlotte Dundas." The crank was fixed on the paddle-shaft of the stern-wheel which impelled the vessel, and was worked from the piston-rod by means of a connecting-rod. Since then the crank has superseded the sun-and-planet wheel motion and all other devices for producing rotary motion in the steam-engine. The bell-crank, so called from its frequent use in bell-hanging, is only used to change the direction of a reciprocating motion. A two-throw or three-throw crank-shaft is one having so many cranks set at different angles on the shaft.

(2) A contrivance used for labour in prisons, consisting of a small wheel, like the paddle-wheel of a steamer, which the prisoner has to turn with a handle in a box more or less filled with gravel.

2. Naut.: Iron braces which support the lanterns on the poop-quarters.

3. Mining: That part of the axle of the fly which is bent into three knees, or right angles, and three projecting parts; one of the parts is parallel to the axis, and has the upper part of the crank-hook collared round it. (Wedge.)

crānk, *cranok, *cranke, a. & s. [Icel. krankr = sick, ill; Dut. & Ger. krank.] [CRANK, s.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

- * 1. Sick, ill.
- 2. In a shaky or loose condition; cranky. "In the case of the Austrian Empire the crank machinery of the double government would augment all the difficulties and enfeeble every effort of the State."—Times, Nov. 11, 1876.
- * 3. Lively, merry, brisk, active, sprightly. "He, who was a little before bedded and carried like a dead karkas on fower mannes shoulders, was now cranks and lustic."—Udal: Mark II.
- * 4. Strong, mighty.

"Towered the Great Harry, crank and tall."—Longfellow: The Building of the Ship.

† 5. Peevish, morose, sour-tempered, cranky.

II. Naut.: Liable to upset; an epithet for a vessel when she cannot bear her sail, or when her floor is so narrow that she cannot be brought on the ground without danger.

"In plying down the river, the Resolution was found to be very crank, which made it necessary to put into Sheerness in order to remove this evil, by making some alteration in her upper works."—Cook: Voyage, vol. iii, bk. I, ch. 1.

B. As subst.: A sick person.

" . . . some notable examples of such counterfeit cranks, and every village almost will yield abundant testimonies amongst us; we have Dunamores, Abraham-men, &c.—Burton: Anat. of Melancholy, p. 159.

crank-axle, s.

1. Vehicles: An axle bent down between the wheels, in order to lower the bed of the wagon and make loading more easy.

2. Steam-engine: The driving-axle to which are connected the piston-rods of a locomotive engine. In America they are connected to wrists on the drive-wheels.

crank-bird, s. A local name for the Lesser Spotted Woodpecker (Picus minor). From the cry, which is said to resemble the creaking of a windlass.

crank-brace, s. The usual form of brace, which has a bent shank by which it is rotated.

crank-hatches, s. pl. Hatches for covering the cranks of the engines within steamboats.

crank-hook, s. The bar connecting the treadle and crank in the common foot-lathe.

crank-pin, s. A pin connecting the ends of a double crank or projecting from the end of a single crank. In either case it is for the attachment of a pitman or connecting-rod.

crank-puller, s. A machin for pulling the crank off an axle or shaft. (Knight.)

crank-shaft, s. A shaft driven by a crank, such as that of the grindstone.

crank-wheel, s. A wheel having a wrist to which a pitman or connecting-rod is attached, and acting as a crank, while the peripheral portion may act as a fly-wheel, or may constitute a pulley or a traction-wheel. (Knight.)

* crānk, v. t. & t. [CRANK, a.]

1. Intrans.: To run in and out, to wind and turn, to dodge.

"He cranks and crosses with a thousand doubles."—Shakspeare: Titus and Adonia.

2. Trans.: To shackle; to apply the hob or ham-shackle to a horse.

"As for the reward of presumption, it is in Scotland to be cranked before and kicked behind."—Perkins of Mar 1, 207.

crānked, a. [Eng. crank; -ed.] Having a bend or turn.

cranked tool, s.

Iron-turning: A tool which is made to embrace the rest, by which it is prevented from slipping away from the work. A pin is inserted in one of the holes in the rest, to prevent the escape of the tool sideways. The direct penetration is obtained by depressing the handle; the lateral motion by rotating the tool by its transverse handle, which may be a hand-vice temporarily screwed upon the shaft, or a shoulder-rest handle. (Knight.)

bēll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -fion, -gion = zhūn. -tious, -sious, -cious = shūs. -ble, -gle. &c. = bel, gel.

Arch.: Moving or turning on pivots top and bottom (applied to doors).
crāpe, s. [Fr. crêpe; O. Fr. crêpe = curled, frizzled, crisp; Lat. crispus = crisp (q.v.).]
Fabric: A gauzy fabric made of raw silk, and woven without crossing. Uncoloured, or gaily dyed, it is a rich shawl-stuff. Coloured black and crimped, it is a mourning-goods. Smooth crape is used in ecclesiastical habits of a certain order, not quite so elevated as the cambric lawn of a bishop. Silk intended for crisp crape is more twisted than that for the smooth. The twist of the thread, especially that of the warp, is what gives the wrinkled appearance to the goods when taken out of the loom. Aérophanes and gauzes are goods of a similar description, either white or coloured. Crape is said to have been made by Ste. Badour, Queen of France, A. D. 680. It was first made at Bonlogna. (Knight.) crāpe-fish, s. Codfish salted and pressed hard.

crās-péd-ō-ōph-āl-ūs, a. [Gr. κράσπεδον (kraspedon) (CRASPEDIA), and κεφαλή (kephalē) = the head.]

Zool.: A genus of Serpents, family Crotalidae (Rattlesnakes). In place of the rattle of the typical Crotalus there is only a spine. Craspedocephalus lanceolatus is a very venomous snake, infesting the cane-fields of the West Indies. It is sometimes six to seven feet long.

crās-pē-dō-tā, s. pl. [CRASPEDOTE.]

Zool.: The naked-eyed Medusae (from their being furnished with a muscular velum).

crās-pē-dōte, a. & s. [Gr. κρασπέδω (kraspedō) = to furnish with a border, to edge.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to the Naked-eyed Medusae.

B. As subst.: Any animal belonging to the Naked-eyed Medusae.

crās, a. [Lat. crassus = thick, dense.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of material things: Thick, coarse; not thin or fine.

... a crass and humid exhalation, caused from the combat of the sulphur of iron with the acid and nitrous spirits of aquafortis.—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

2. Of immaterial things, as the intellect, &c.: Dull, stupid, obtuse, gross, not refined.

... more crass or corporeal cogitations, . . .—Cicero: Inmutabile Morality, bk. iv, ch. i.

II. Bot.: Thicker than what is usual in similar cases. The normal state of leaves is to be papery, that of cotyledons is to be of thicker and more fleshy texture: the latter may be called crass. (Lindley.)

* crās-sa-mēt, * crassiment, s. [Lat. crassamentum, from crassus = thick.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Thickness, coarseness.

... all the other solid parts of the body, that are made of the same crassiment of seed, may be here included.—Smith: Portraiture of Old Age, p. 179.

2. Med.: [CRASSAMENTUM.]

crās-sa-mēn-tūm, s. [Lat. = the sediment of a liquid, the dregs, the lees.]

Anat.: The thicker part of the blood, a red mass of corpuscles cemented together by fibrine so as to form a red consistent mass.

"When blood is drawn from a vein, and allowed to rest, it speedily separates into a solid portion, the crassamentum, or clot, and a fluid portion, the serum."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. 1, p. 57.

crās-sā-tōl-lā, s. [Dimin. of Lat. crassus = thick.]

Zool.: A genus of Molluscs, family Cyprinidae. The shell is solid, ventricose, attenuated behind, smooth or concentrically furrowed, the pallial line simple, the hinge teeth 1 or 2, the lateral teeth 0 or 1, the adductor impressions deep and rounded, the animal with the mantle lobes united only by the branchial septum. Thirty-four recent species are known from Australia, New Zealand, India, Brazil, &c.; sixty-four fossil species have been found, the latter from the Neocomian onward. (Woodward, ed. Tate.)

* crās-sī-mēt, s. [CRASSAMENT.]

* crās-sī-tūde, s. [Lat. crassitudo, from crassus = thick, coarse.]

1. Of solids: Thickness, grossness, coarseness.

"They must be hut thio, as a leaf, or a piece of paper or parchment; for, if they have a greater crassitudo, they will alter in their own body. . . .—Bacon.

2. Of liquids: Density.

"The Dead Sea, which vomiteth up bitumen, is of this crassitudo, as living bodies, bound hand and foot, and cast into it, have been born up, and not sunk."—Bacon: Natural History.

* crās-s-nōss, s. [Eng. crass; -ness.] The quality or state of being crass, gross, or coarse; grossness, coarseness, obtuseness.

"The ethereal body contracts crassness and impurity by the same degree as the immaterial faculties abate in their exercise."—Glanville: Pre-existence of Souls, p. 113.

crās-sul-a, s. [Dimin. of Lat. crassus = thick. So named from the thickness of the fleshy leaves and stems.]

Bot.: A genus of hypogynous exogens, the typical one of this order Crassulaceae and the tribe Crassuleae. Calyx five-parted, much shorter than the corolla; petals five, stellate, spreading; stamens five, with awl-shaped filaments; five short ovate scales present; carpels, five, many-seeded. The species, which are fifty or more, are mostly natives of the Cape of Good Hope. Some are cultivated in green-houses here. The leaves of Crassula tetragona, boiled in milk, are used in South Africa as a remedy for dysentery.

crās-sū-lā-ō-ō, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. crassul(a), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -aeae.]

Bot.: House-leeks. An order of hypogynous exogens, alliance Violaceae. It consists of succulent herbs or shrubs with entire or pinnatifid leaves and no stipules, flowers usually in sessile, often unilateral cymes. Sepals 3 to 20, more or less united at the base, petals inserted in the bottom of the calyx distinct or united into a monopetalous corolla; stamens equal in number to the petals, or twice as many; a hypogynous ovule at the base of each carpel. Fruct of several follicles, opening by the suture, or a several-celled capsule opening at the back. Seeds various in number. In 1845 Lindley estimated the known species at 450. The Cape of Good Hope is their great metropolis, but there are species scattered over Europe; a few are wild in Britain.

crās-sū-lō-ō, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. crassul(a); fem. pl. adj. suff. -aeae.] A tribe of Crassulaceae.

* crās-tin-ā-tion, s. [Formed from Lat. crastinus = belonging to to-morrow; cras = to-morrow.] Procrastination, delay.

* crās-tin-ō, s. [Lat. crastinus.]

Law: To-morrow, the morrow; a term used in regard to the return-day of writs.

* cra-sy, a. [CRAZY.]

cra-tæg-in, s. [Class. Lat. cratægus]; and Eng. suff. -in.]

Chem.: A crystalline bitter substance obtained from the fresh-branch bark of the White-thorn, Crataegus Oxyacantha. It is soluble in water, slightly soluble in alcohol, and insoluble in ether.

cra-tæg-gūs, s. [Lat. cratægus, cratægus; Gr. κράταγος (kratagios); κραταγών (kratagōn) = a kind of flowering thorn, Crataegus azarolla, or Pyrus terminalis (?).]

Bot.: A genus of trees, order Pomaceae. Calyx segmenta short and acuta, petals large and roundish, styles 1 to 5, fruit oval or round, concealing the upper end of the cells, which are long. It differs from the genus Pyrus in containing a variable number of stones, and from the medlar by having the fruit closed. The genus contains about eighty well-marked species and varieties, occurring in the temperate parts of both hemispheres. Crataegus Oxyacantha is the Hawthorn, or May. It is a European thorn, growing wild in this country. [HAWTHORN.] The Oriental species have heavy leaves, large fragrant flowers, and large, succulent, somewhat angular fruit; those from America are often very spinous. Finally, some species of the genus—viz., C. mexicana and C. pyracantha—are evergreens.

cra-tæg-va, s. [Named after Cratæus, a Greek botanist who lived in the time of Hippocrates—i. e., about 430 B.C.]

crāte, s. [Lat. crates = a hurdle.] A large wicker hamper with wooden supports, in which crockery-ware is packed for transportation. Crates among the Romans corresponded to the English hurdles. They were of wicker work, and were used for screens, for levelling ground after rough-raking (rastrum); also for drying fruit.

crā-tēr, s. [Lat. crater; Gr. κρατήρ (kratēr) = a mixing vessel . . . a large bowl . . . any cup-shaped hollow . . . the mouth of a volcano.]

1. Class. Archaeol.: A large bowl. [Etym.]

"It was decreed that with the sun thus obtained a golden crater should be dedicated to Apollo."—Lewia: Ger. Rom. Hist., ch. xii, pt. v, l. 74, vol. ii, p. 308.

2. Geol. & Ord. Lang.: The basin-like, circular opening, generally at the apex of a volcanic cone, from which eruption takes place. It is formed in the following way. A chasm or fissure opens in the earth, from which great volumes of steam and other gases are evolved. Shattered lava, fragments of broken stone, sand, &c., follow; and, falling in heaps, lay the basis of what, by the continuance of the same process, will ultimately become a volcanic cone. The movement upwards of steam and other gases keeps open a passage from beneath to the apex of the cone. This passage is the crater. The efflux of lava may ultimately consolidate it, or it may produce the contrary effect and break it down. There may be many cones and many craters, or one large volcano, and escape of gases may be by long fissures instead of by cup-shaped craters. (Lyell, &c.)

3. Astronomy:

(1) In the same sense as 1. There are apparent craters in the moon, and much larger than those in the earth, being sometimes as much as 100 miles across.

(2) A constellation, called in English the Cup, one of the fifteen ancient southern constellations.

* Elevation crater theory:

Geol.: A theory which explained the rise of volcanic cones with their craters by supposing that the concentric beds of scoriae, &c., now forming the cone were originally horizontal, but were upheaved to their present position by subterranean forces. It was held by Von Buch, Elie de Beaumont, and others; but is now generally abandoned, the rival theory of Lyell and others being that the beds in question have been formed by the descent of materials ejected into the air by successive eruptions, and arranging themselves at or about the angle at which we now find them as they fell.

crā-tēr-a, s. [Lat. = a vessel in which wine was mixed with water, a bowl.]

Bot.: The cup-shaped receptacles of certain fungi. (Treas. of Bot.)

"Touching other places, she may be said to hold them as one should do a wolf by the ears; nor will I speak now of the crāziness of her title to many of them." —Hovel: Vocal Forest.

crā-zīng, s. [CRAZE, v.] The cracking of the glaz upon articles of pottery or porcelain.

crāzing-mill, s. A crushing mill.
"The tin-ore passeth to the crāzing-mill, which ... bruisth it to a fine sand." —Carew: Survey of Cornwall.

crā-zý, v. crasie, a. & s. [Eng. cras(e); -y.]

- A. As adjective:
1. Broken down, damaged, out of order, weak, not safe.
"Othron! receive a family on board, Itself sufficient for thy crāzy yaw!" Copier: Transl. of Greek Verses; on Nioba.
- 2. Broken down in body, decrepit.
"When people are crāzy, and in disorder, it is natural for them to groan." —L'Extrange.
- 3. Weak, feeble, shattered.
"Physick can but mend our crāzy state, Patch an old building, not a new create." Dryden.
- 4. Broken-witted, deranged.
"And over moist and crazy brains." Baile: Hudibras.

† B. As subst.: The Buttercup (genus Ranunculus), the Midland rustics holding it to be "an insane herb," and believing that its smell produces madness. (Britten & Holland.)

crāzy-headed, a. Deranged in intellect, crazy.

"... there is a company of these crāzy-headed ex-combs, ..." —Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress, pt. 1.

crā-zý-ōl-ō-gist, s. [A contemptuous corruption of craniologist (q.v.).] A craniologist.

"The crāzylogists would have found out a bump on his head." —Southey: The Doctor, ch. xxxiv. (Davies).

crō-ā-ble, a. [Lat. creabilis, from creo = to create.] Capable of being created. (Watts.)

creach, creagh, s. [Gael. creach = plunder.] An incursion into a country for plunder; what is termed on the Borders a raid.
"A creagh and its consequences." —Scott: Waverley, ch. xv.

creacht, s. [Irish.]

- 1. A herd of cattle.
"In these fast places, they kept their creachts, or herds of cattle, ..." —Davies: On Ireland.
- 2. The same as RAPPAREE (q.v.).
"He was soon at the head of seven or eight thousand Rapparees, or, to use the name peculiar to Ulster, Creights." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

creacht, v.t. [CREAHT, s.] To graze.
"It was made penal to the English to permit the Irish to creacht or graze upon their lands, or present them to ecclesiastical benefices." —Davies: On Ireland.

creak, creke, kreke, v.t. & i. [A word imitated from the sound. Comp. O. Fr. criquer.] [CRAEK.]

- A. Intransitive:
1. To make a continued sharp, grating noise.
"And the branches tossed and troubled, Creaked, and groaned, and split asunder." Longfellow: The Song of Hiawatha, xviii.
- 2. To utter a sharp, grating cry; to croak.
"He cryeth and he creaketh." Shelton: Colin Clout.

B. Transitive:
1. To cause to make a sharp, grating noise.
"Creaking my shoes on the plain masonry." Shakespeare: All's Well, II. 1.- 2. To utter in a creaking voice.
"My songs is bothe trewe and pleyne, Although I cannot creak hit so in veyne." Chaucer: Guckoo and Nighth, III.

creāk, creake, s. [CRAEK, v.] A protracted sharp, grating noise.

¶ To cry creak: To yield, to repent.
"I now cry creaks, that ere I scorned love, Whose might is more than other gods above." Watson: Passionate Centurie, 161. (Nares.)

creak-íng, pr. par., a., & s. [CREAK, v.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).
C. As substantive:
 1. Lit.: Making a protracted, harsh, grating noise.
 2. Fig.: Rough, uncouth.
 "Still must I hear—shall hoarse Fitzgerald bawl His creaking complaints in a tavern hall?"
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.
C. As subst.: The act of making a harsh, grating noise; a creak.
 "Then start not at the creaking of the door."
Longfellow: The Golden Legend, v. 1.

cream (1), *crayme, *creame, *crème, s. [O. Fr. crème; Fr. crème, from Low Lat. crema. Prob. allied to A.S. creām = cream; Icel. ryml. (Skeat.)] [CHRISM.]
I. Ordinary Language:
A. Literally:
 1. In the same sense as B.
 "Cream is matured and made to rise speedily, by putting in cold water, which, as it seetheth, getteth down the whey."—Bacon: Natural History.
 2. A sweetmeat prepared from cream, various fruits, &c.
 3. A cosmetic.
 "To valu she tries her pastes and creams To smooth her skin or hide its seams."
Goldsmith: The Double Transformation.
 4. Consecrated oil, chrism.
 "Ich signt the with signe of croys, And with the crems of hell conferm!"
Shoreham, p. 15.

II. Figuratively:
 1. The best part of anything; the choicest bit; the essence or quintessence.
 "In an instant, all the leads of the courts and entries were thronged with men and maid-servants of the duke's, who cried aloud, Welcomes, Oh flower and cream of knights-errant."—Shelton: Don Quixote, bk. II, ch. xxxi.
 2. A name given to the finest liqueurs.
B. Technically:
 1. Dairy Product: The most oily part of milk. It is specifically lighter than the other constituents, and therefore rises to the surface, whence it is generally skimmed to be used as an adjunct in making tea and coffee palatable, to be eaten with various fruits (such as strawberries), or for other purposes. If a saturated solution of white sugar be boiled for a couple of minutes and cream added before it cools, the cream, if preserved in a cool place, will keep fresh for some weeks.
 2. Chem.: [Cream of Tartar.]
 3. Masonry, &c.: [Cream of Lime.]
 ¶ (1) Cream of Lime (For def. see extract).
 "Adjacent to these reservoirs are others containing pure slaked lime—the so-called cream of lime."—Tymnall: Frag. of Science (3rd ed.), ch. xl, p. 841.
 (2) Cream of Tartar:
Pharm.: Hydrogen potassium tartarate, KHC<sub>4</sub>O<sub>6</sub>. Potasse Tartros Acida. A salt obtained from the crude tartar, or argol, which is deposited on the sides of wine casks during the fermentation of grape juice. It is a gritty white powder which forms small rhombic prisms, is sparingly soluble in water, and insoluble in alcohol. Heated in a crucible it evolves inflammable gas and the odour of burnt sugar, and leaves a black residue of charcoal and potassium carbonate. In small doses it is a refrigerant and diuretic; in large doses a powerful hydragogue purgative. It is given, mixed with jalap, as a purgative in cases of dropsy, and is used as a drink in febrile affections.
 (3) Cream of Tartar Tree: A tree, Adansonia Gregoria, growing in the north of Australis. It is called also the Sour Gourd. (Treas. of Bot.) cream-bowl, s. A bowl for holding cream.

 "Tells how the drudging goblin sweats To earn his cream-bowl duly set."
Milton: L'Allegro. cream-cake, s. A cake stuffed with custard of eggs, cream, &c.
cream-cheese, s. A variety of cheese made of curds prepared from new milk, with a certain amount of cream added. The curds are piced in a cloth and allowed to drain without the application of any pressure.
cream-colour, s.
Bot.: Ivory-white; white verging to yellow with a little lustre, as Convolvularia majalis. (Lindley.) cream-coloured, a. Of a colour resembling that of cream.

*cream-faced, a. With a pale or colourless face; cowardly.
 "Thou cream-fac'd low, Where got'st thou that goose-look?"
cream-freezer, s. A domestic machine in which cream is stirred in a vessel plunged in a freezing mixture.
cream-fruit, s. A fruit found at Sierra Leone, conjectured to belong to the Apocynaceae. It was supposed to be Roupellia grata, but it is now believed that this was an error. The real plant is as yet unidentified.
cream-laid, a. An epithet applied to laid paper of a creamy colour.
cream-nut, s. A name sometimes given to Bertholletia excelsa. [BRAZIL-NUT.] (Ogilvie.) cream-pan, s. The same as CREAMING-PAN (q.v.).
cream-pot, s. A small jug or vessel for holding cream.
cream-slice, s. A wooden knife for dividing and serving frozen cream.
cream-white, a. The same as CREAM-COLOURED (q.v.).
cream-wove, a. An epithet applied to woven paper of a cream colour.

crēam (2), s. [CREME.] Merchandise, goods.
cream-ware, creme-ware, s. Goods such as are sold at stalls or booths.

crēam, v. t. & i. [CREAM (1), s.]
A. Transitive:
 † I. Literally:
 1. To skim off the cream from milk.
 2. To cover or top with cream.
 "Creaming the fragrant cups with a rich lavishment."—Whitney: Real Folks, ch. xvii.
 * II. Fig.: To take off the flower or quintessence of anything.
 "Such a man, truly wise, creams off nature, leaving the sour and dregs for philosophy and reason to lap up."—Swift.
B. Intransitive:
 1. To gather cream; to receive a covering or coating; to mantle.
 "There are a sort of men, whose visages Do cream and mantle like a standing pond."
Shakspeare: Merch. of Venice, I. 1.
 2. To pour out or use cream.
 "He sugared and creamed and drank."—Miss Edgeworth: Helen, ch. xxxvi.

crēamed, pa. par. or a. [CREAM, v.]
crēam-ēr, s. [Eng. cream (2), s.; -er.] A huckster, a pedlar.
crēam-ēr-y (1), s. [Eng. cream; -ery = -ry.]
 1. A dairy-farm; an establishment where cream is manufactured into butter or cheese. Creameries have become common in the United States, as cooperative enterprises of farmers. Their utility in the production of good butter is such that they are being adopted in parts of Europe.
 * crēam-ēr-y (2), *crēam-ēr-ye, s. [Eng. cream (2), s.; -ery = -ry.] Merchandise, such goods as are usually sold by a pedlar.
 "With my creamery gif ye list mell; Heir I half foly hattle to sell."
Lyndsay, S. P. R., II. 94.

crēam-ī-nēss, s. [Eng. creamy; -ness.] The quality or state of being creamy.
crēam-íng, pr. par. or a. [CREAM, v.]
creaming-dish, s. (See extract).
 "The creaming-dishes (so I call the vessels in which the milk is passed for throwing up cream) are to be filled with the milk as soon after it is drawn from the cow as possible."—Anderson: On the Dairy.
creaming-pan, s. A wide shallow pan or vessel used in dairies for the milk to stand in till the cream rises to the top.
 "A better practice would be, to have the milk drawn from each cow separately put into the creaming-pans, as soon as it is milked, without being ever mixed."
Anderson: On the Dairy.
crēam-y, a. [Eng. cream; -y.]
 1. Full of cream; containing cream.
 2. Like cream; luscious, unctuous.

* 3. Soft, flattering.
 "Your creamy words but cessen."
Boam, and Plet.: Queen of Corinth, III. 1.
*crē-ānce, *creance, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. credentia = belief; Lat. credo = to believe.]
I. Ordinary Language:
 1. Faith, belief.
 "This maiden taught the creance unto this wife."
Gower, I. 156.
 2. Credit, borrowing, surety.
 "... by creance of coyne."—Depos. of Rich. II., p. 4.
II. Falconry: A fine small line, fastened to a hawk's leash when she is first jured.
*crē-ānce, *creance, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. creanser.] [CREANCE, s.]
 1. Trans.: To borrow.
 "This marchand . . . creanced hath and payed This somme of gold."
Chaucer: C. T., 14, 774.
 2. Intrans.: To borrow.
 "Now goth this marchand and bieth and creanceseth."
Chaucer: C. T., 14, 714.

*crē-an-çer, *croanser, *creansour, s. [Fr. crancier.] A creditor.
 "Stille the oyle and yelde to thy creanser."
Wycliffe: 2 Kings IV. 7.
*creat, a. [Fr. créant, pr. par. of créer; Lat. creans, pr. par. of creo = to create.] Creating, forming.
 "The creat word Which thrilled around us."
Mrs. Browning.

crēase (1), s. [Of unknown etymol.; perhaps a Celtic word. Skeat suggests connection with Bret. kris = a wrinkle, but this suggestion is rejected by Dr. Murray.]
I. Ordinary Language:
 1. A line or mark made by folding or doubling anything.
 2. A slight hollow or indentation.
 "... small creases or furrows."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. I, ch. xiv., p. 410.
II. Technically:
 1. Mech.: A creaser.
 2. Cricket: A name given to certain lines marked on the ground at each wicket. They are three in number, the bowling-crease, the return-crease, and the popping-crease. The first extends in a straight line at right angles to the line of play, 3 ft. 4 in. each side of the centre of the stumps. The second is a short line drawn at an angle to the end of the bowling-crease. The bowler in delivering his ball must have one foot behind the bowling-crease, and within the return-crease. The popping-crease is a line drawn parallel to the bowling-crease, and at a distance of 4 ft. from it. It is unlimited in length. The batsman cannot move out of the space between the bowling and popping-creases except at the risk of being put out.

crease (2), s. [CREESE.]
crēase, v. t. [CREASE, s.] To make a crease or mark in by doubling or folding.
 "Under a tea-cup he might lie Or creas'd, like dog's ears, in a folio."
Gray: Long Story.
crēased, pa. par. or a. [CREASE, v.]
crēas-ēr, s. [Eng. crease(s); -er.]
I. Ord. Lang.: One who or that which creases.
II. Technically:
 1. Leather-working: A tool used for making single or double lines on leather, to form guides or creases to sew by. They are also used for lining leather, to give it a finished appearance.
 2. Iron-working: A tool used by sheet-iron workers for rounding small beads and tubes. Its shank has a tang by which it is secured in a square socket of the work-bench. Top and bottom creasing tools, of any suitable size and pattern, may be set in the jaws of a creasing-swage, the lower end of whose frame has a tang to set in the work-bench, while the upper hinged portion carries the top tool and is struck by a hammer.

3. Book-binding: A tool for making the band-impression distinct on the back.

4. Sewing-machins: An attachment which makes a mark in a line parallel with the work in hand, to indicate the place for the next seam or tuck.

créas-íng, pr. par., a., & s. [CREASE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of making a crease or mark in anything by folding or doubling; a crease.

"It is rather a mass, with longitudinal parallel streaks, many of which are creasing."—Todd & Bowman: Physiol. Anat., vol. 1, ch. 1, p. 89.

2. Building: A layer of tiles forming a cornice for a wall.

creasing-hammer, s. A narrow rounded-edge hammer, used for making grooves in sheet metal.

creasing-tool, s. A creaser (q.v.).

cré-as-ól, s. [Eng., & c., creas(ote), and Lat. oleum = oil.]

Chem.: Cresol, C<sub>6</sub>H<sub>7</sub>O<sub>2</sub>. A diatomic phenol, obtained by the dry distillation of guaiacum, also from creasote. It is a colourless, oily, refractive, odorous liquid, with a pungent taste. Its density is 1.037, boiling at 203°. It burns with a smoky flame.

cré-a-sôte, cré-ô-sôte, †kré-a-sôte, s. [Fr. créosote; Gr. κρεο- (kreo), combining form of κρέας (kreas) = flesh, and σῶζω (sôzô) = to save. So named because of its ability to preserve animal substances from decay.

1. Comm.: An impure cresol, mixed with phenol. Wood creasote has powerful antiseptic power. Wood smoke contains this substance, hence its power of preserving meat. Creasote is used to relieve toothache, but often causes the neighbouring teeth to decay.

2. Phar.: Creasotum is obtained by distilling wood-tar. It is a colourless liquid, with a strong empyreumatic odour. It is slightly soluble in water, readily soluble in alcohol, ether, and in glacial acetic acid; it coagulates albumen, and turns the plans of polarisation of a ray of polarised light to the right. It is used to prepare Mistura Creasoti, Unguentum Creasoti, and Vapor Creasoti. A slip of deal wood dipped into it, and afterwards into hydrochloric acid, acquires on exposure to the air a greenish-blue colour. German creasote is prepared by distilling beech-wood. Creasote is a mixture of phenol, guaiacol, paracresol, &c.

creasote-appliance, s. A dentist's instrument intended to prevent fluid caustics, such as creasote or solution of nitrate of silver, from running down and cauterizing the lips when being applied to the gums. A spiral platinum-wire carries the sponge, and a glass tube attached to the handle and surrounding the wire catches any of the canatic which may run down the wire. (Knight.)

cré-a-sôte, cré-ô-sôte, v. t. [CREASOTE, s.] To treat or saturate with creasote.

cré-a-sô-tíng, cré-ô-sô-tíng, pr. par., a., & s. [CREASOTE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: A mode of preventing decay of timber by saturating with creasote. This is said to coagulate the albumen, absorb the oxygen, resinify in the pores of the wood and exclude air, and act as a poison to prevent fungi, acari, and other parasites. (Knight.)

*creast, s. [CREST.]

*eréast'-éd, a. [CRESTED.]

†créas'-ý, a. [Eng. creas(e); -y.] Full of or marked with creases.

"The babe who reared his creasy arms."—Tennyson: Enoch Arden.

cré-át, s. [Fr., from Lat. creatus; Ital. creato; Sp. criado = a pupil.]

Manège: An usher to a riding-master.

†cré-á-ta-ble, a. [Eng. creat(e); -able.] Possible to be created.

cré-áte, *creat, v. t. [CREATE, a. In Fr. créer; Sp. & Port. crear, criar; Ital. creare.]

1. To make out of nothing; to cause to exist; to bring into existence.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."—Genesis 1. 1.

2. To produce, to cause, to be the occasion of.

"Long abstinence is troublesome to acid constitutions, by the unassisted it creates in the stomach."—Arbuthnot.

3. To produce, to compose, to arrange, to be the author of.

"... seem'd by some magician's art Created and sustain'd."

Coeper: On the Queen's Visit to London, March 17, 1789.

*4. To beget.

5. To appoint, to constitute, to invest with a new character.

"Arise, my knights o' th' battle: I create you Companions to our person, and will fit you With dignities becoming your estates."—Shaksp.: Cymbeline, v. 5.

*6. To form, to make.

"King Richard might create a perfect geuss."—Shaksp.: 2 Henry VI, III. 1.

¶ To find the difference between create and to cause, see CAUSE.

*cré-áte, *creat, a. [Lat. creatus, pa. par. of creo = to create.]

1. Brought into existence, created.

"Since Adam was created, five thousand yeeres I gesse Five hundredth, forty more and five as stories do expresse."

Gascoigne: Dan Bartholomew of Bath.
2. Composed, made up.

"Hearts create of duty and of zeal."—Shaksp.: Henry V, II. 2.

cré-át'-éd, pa. par. or a. [CREATE, v.]

cré-át'-yo, a. [Gr. κρεα-; stem of κρέας (kreas) = flesh; Eng. suff. -ic.] Pertaining to flesh, or to animal food.

cré-a-tio'-ô-lô, s. pl. [The pl. of Lat. creatio = the worshipper of a created being, from creatus = created, i connective, and colo = . . . to worship.]

Ch. Hist.: A monophysite sect in the sixth century who followed Severus in holding that, previous to the resurrection of our Saviour, his body was corruptible. They were called also Pihartolatre and Ktistolatre. All the three names were given them by their foes.

cré-at-ine, s. [Ger. Kreatin, from Gr. κρέας (kreas), genit. κρέατος (kreatos) = flesh, and suff. -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.: Methyl-glycoeyamine. Methyl-guanido-acetic acid, C<sub>4</sub>H<sub>9</sub>N<sub>3</sub>O<sub>2</sub> + H<sub>2</sub>O, or HN=C<N(CH<sub>3</sub>)-CH<sub>2</sub>-CO-OH. Creatine is obtained from the muscular flesh of mammals, birds, reptiles, and fishes. It has been found in the blood and urine, and in the brains of pigeons and dogs. It is obtained by chopping up the lean muscular flesh, removing the fat, and rubbing it with water and pressing it; the liquid is heated in a water-bath to coagulate the albumen, then strained; to the filtrate baryta-water is added so long as it gives a precipitate, the filtrate concentrated on a water-bath, the crystals, which separate, decolorised by animal charcoal and re-crystallised from water. Creatine crystallises in rhombic needles containing one molecule of water, which is driven off at 100°. The water solution has a bitter taste, and is neutral to litmus. It gives a white precipitate with silver nitrate, which is soluble in potash. After a time the solution solidifies to a transparent gelatinous mass, which is reduced when heated. Creatine heated gives off ammonia and hydrocyanic acid. Creatine is dissolved by strong acids; it loses a molecule of water, and is converted into Creatinine. By boiling with baryta-water creatine is decomposed, yielding sarcosine, methyl glycoeyns, C<sub>3</sub>H<sub>7</sub>N<sub>2</sub>O + urea CO<N(CH<sub>3</sub>)-NH<sub>2</sub>. Creatine has been formed synthetically by heating cyanamide, C<NHN, with sarcosine, CH<sub>2</sub><NH-CH<sub>3</sub>, in an alcoholic solution to 100° for some hours; or leaving a mixed aqueous solution to evaporate, the creatine separates out in crystals. Creatine heated to redness with soda-lime in a tube, yields NH<sub>3</sub> and methylamine, NH<sub>2</sub>CH<sub>3</sub>.

cré-á-tíng, pr. par., a., & s. [CREATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of giving existence or being to; production, creation.

"For he opens the whole discussion by stating, That God can only exist in creating."

Longfellow: The Golden Legend, vi.

cr3-át'-ín-ine, s. [Eng. creatin(e); suff. -ine. In Ger. Kreatinin.]

Chem.: Methyl-glycoeyamidine, C<sub>4</sub>H<sub>9</sub>N<sub>3</sub>O, or HN=C<N(CH<sub>3</sub>)-CH<sub>2</sub>. Creatinine occurs in urine and in muscular flesh; it is found in the mother liquid formed in the preparation of creatine. It can be prepared by the action of strong acids on creatine, also by evaporating, below 100°, fresh urine neutralised with carbonate of sodium to a syrup. The syrup is exhausted by alcohol, and the filtrate is mixed with a concentrated alcoholic solution of zinc chloride; the precipitate, after standing some time, is washed and boiled with water; the filtrate is evaporated; the crystals are dissolved in hot water and purified by recrystallisation; the solution in boiling water is then digested with hydrated lead oxide, filtered from the oxide of zinc and oxylchloride of lead, purified by blood charcoal; strong alcohol dissolves the creatinine and leaves the creatine. Creatinine forms colourless prisms, very soluble in water and in alcohol; a concentrated solution has an alkaline taste, reddens turmeric, and turns red litmus blue. It is a strong base. Creatinine concentrated solution gives a ruby-red colour, when made slightly alkaline with potash and nitro-prusside of sodium is added. Creatinine forms salts with acids. (Watts: Diet. Chem., &c.)

cré-á-tion, *creacion, s. [Lat. creatio, from creo = to create; Fr. création; Sp. creacion; Ital. creazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of creating, or of calling into existence out of nothing.

"The mind finds no great difficulty, to distinguish the several originals of things into two sorts: First, When the thing is wholly made up, so that no part thereof did ever exist before; as when a new particle of matter doth begin to exist, in rerum natura, which had before no being; and this we call creation."—Locke: Hum. Underst., bk. II, ch. xxvi.

2. (Spec.): Used absolutely; the act of bringing the world into existence.

3. The point of time when the world was created.

4. The set of appointing, constituting, or investing with a new character or position.

"The Gazette which announced these creations announced also that the King had set out for the Continent."—Maccuslay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

5. The foundation or first constituting of anything.

"This detailed account of the creation of the dictatorship, and of the appointment of the first dictator, is given by Dionysius."—Lewis: Crad. Brit. Rom. Hist., (1855), ch. xii, pt. 1, § 9, vol. II, p. 27.

6. That which is created or produced.

"The treach'rous colours the fair art betray, And all his bright creations fades away!"—Pope: Essay on Criticism, 402-3.

7. (Spec.): The universe, the world.

"For me your tributary stores combine, Creation's heir, the world, the world is mine."—Goldsmith: The Traveller.

8. An original work, composition, or production.

"... and Schubert's Triolet & Fiat, Op. 100, the latter one of its composer's most individual creations."—Athenæum, March 4, 1882.

II. Technically:

1. Theol.: The act of creating out of nothing, one of the three great operations attributed to God, the others being providence and redemption.

2. Geol.: In the same sense as I.

¶ (1) Centre or Centres of Creation:

(a) Sing. (Centre or focus of Creation): A point or place on the earth's surface where it is assumed that a certain individual species was created, and whence it is supposed that it diffused itself to the various regions in which it now is found.

(b) Pl. (Centres or foci of Creation): Certain spots on the earth's surface where not one but báll, bóy; pòut, jówl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, a; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

various, or perhaps even many species may have been created, and whence they may have been disseminated. The Darwinians would object to the use of the word creation in connection with "the origin of species," but admit centres or foci where they have come into being.

(2) Date, era, or epoch of the Creation: There are about 140 opinions professedly founded on calculations made from Scripture with respect to the era of the Creation. The highest date given is B.C. 6934, the lowest 8616, a difference of 3,363 years. One chief reason of the discrepancy is the fact that the Hebrew and the Septuagint chronologies of Genesis v., and some other parts of the same book, differ widely, and there may be difference of opinion as to which has been changed. [CHRONOLOGY.] The geologist draws a wide distinction between the date when man first came into being and that at which the world was produced. The first is a very recent event, if marked on the scale of geological time, but a very remote one as compared with the date assigned by those who have made their calculations solely from the Hebrew or the Greek Septuagint numbers. [ANTHROPOLOGY OF MAN.] Various Christian harmonists have attempted to reconcile Scripture and science in this and other respects. [HARMONY.]

(3) The hypothesis of successive creations: The view was held by Marchison and many others that successive creations have taken place, each an advance on its predecessor.

"These views of the successive creation of different races are, it is true, mainly based upon the progressive rise in the scale of the vertebrate sub-kingdom."—Marchison: Miruria, ch. xviii.

2. Comm., &c.: [BILL OF CREDIT.]

¶ (1) A letter of credit: The same as a Circular letter (q.v.).

(2) Public credit: The faith put by creditors and the public generally in the honesty and financial ability of a government seeking to borrow money.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between credit, favour, and influence: "These terms mark the state we stand in with regard to others as flowing out of their sentiments towards ourselves: credit arises out of esteem; favour out of good-will or affection; influence out of either credit or favour: credit depends altogether on personal merit; favour may depend on the caprice of him who bestows it. Credit, though sometimes obtained by falsehood, is never got without exertion; but favour, whether justly or unjustly bestowed, often comes by little or no effort on the part of the receiver: a minister gains credit with his parishioners by the consistency of his conduct, the gravity of his demeanour, and the strictness of his life; the favour of the populace is gained by arts which men of upright minds would disdain to employ. Credit and favour are the gifts of others; influence is a possession which we derive from circumstances; there will always be influence where there is credit or favour, but it may exist independently of either: we have credit and favour for ourselves; we exert influence over others: credit and favour serve one's own purposes; influence is employed in directing others: weak people easily give their credit or bestow their favour, by which an influence is gained over them to bend them to the will of others." (Crabb; Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between credit and belief, see BELIEF.

créd-it, v.t. [CREDIT, s.]
